Plans for a march on Queen's Park to present a statement to Premier Robarts on French Canadian relations were presented by Canadian Canadian Relations Committee Chairman Richard Pope (IV Trin). The march, to be co-ordinated by the SAC's French Committee, will be held next Friday. A meeting of leaders of virtually all campus organizations produced the statement to be given to Premier Robarts.

Sweeping reforms in this year's Model Parliament were reported and discussed by Model Parliament chairman Ian Thompson (OCE). Thompson said that the charges of conflict of interest arising from the first meeting of the committee had been resolved by a second meeting at which Richard Tan (III Meds), a member of the committee, abstained from voting. Tan, the Model Parliament leader of the Progressive Conservative party, sits on the committee as University of Toronto Debating Union chairman along with representatives from each political club. At the second meeting, only the Liberal club opposed the reforms, with the New Democratic Party club reversing its previous stand, Thompson said.

The specific reform objected to by the Liberal club gives a party receiving more than 40 per cent of the votes an absolute majority of the seats, while a party winning the election with less than this will form a minority government.

A motion to delete this clause from the proposed reforms was made by the Liberal club president Mike Levine (III UC), who characterized the idea as "absurdly unrealistic." Levine's motion received one vote in favor — his own.

In the minority government situation, the Communists could conceivably hold the balance of power, and "those who vote Communist for the H of it had better be prepared for the Hell of it," Thompson said.

Tan strongly denounced The Varsity for its reporting of the alleged conflict of interest and outlined his reasons for voting as he did. He stated that at the time he voted on the reforms, he was not a member of the PC club and not a candidate for the leadership.

The principle of law in this case is that justice must not only be done, it must appear to be done. By allowing Tan to abstain from voting on the issues at the second meeting, Council solved the problem of appearances.

John Roberts (Wyc), University Committee chairman, presented a plan to hold campus-wide hearings in the style of a Royal Commission, on all aspects of student government. The hearings are designed to bring forth the views of all facets of campus opinion, including comments on the level of service presently given by the SAC, Roberts said.

A potentially explosive question of dual representation on council was referred to a commission for further study.

Students in professional faculties registered at New College now appear to have two representatives on council. They are at the present time allowed to vote in both elections. Under the present constitution, written before the multi-faculty college was conceived, any college or faculty with more than 500 students registered is entitled to two representatives on council.

New College has 501 students, of which more than 200 are in professional faculties.

Council voted not to seat a second New College rep until the question was decided.

Also, at the request of any four council members, voting in council can be conducted on a proportional basis, with each rep casting votes equal to the number of students in their college or faculty.

Both New College rep Stan Adelman, and APSC rep Dave Sefton, claimed at Wednesday's meeting that he spoke for the Engineers registered in New College.

Several interesting questions were asked in the question period at the beginning of the meeting. In answer to a question: "How many SAC members had their McGill Weekend expenses paid by council?" president Ward replied that six elected members, two on each train, were sent as a liaison with the police and the SAC, and three of the appointed staff flew down Friday and spent the day checking space problems at hotels and jails.

Several questions addressed to the Varsity editor elicited the information that Varsity editorials are the opinion of the paper, and that they are written at times by persons other than the editor without being signed. But Drushka stated that he wrote the Remembrance Day editorial.

In the shadow of more controversial issues, council also passed its budget for 1963-64 with two minor questions serving as the only debate. The vote was unanimous.

of English domination. "The very fact of the Toronto origin of this movement will make a great impression of French Canada," he said.

Council accepted Pope's report, and went on to note unanimously on a motion supporting the aims of the committee and the other groups in connection with the march.

At the earlier meeting it was decided to hold two additional meetings before the march.

The first will be held today in the Varsity office at 1 p.m. for representatives of all campus organizations, to prepare for the march.

A second meeting will be held Wednesday at 1 p.m. in Room 2102, Sidney Smith Hall, for all students, faculty members and students will explain the significance of the conference, and the role students at this university can play in expressing their views.

The University College Literary and Athletic Society yesterday passed a motion acknowledging the decision of the SAC and the other campus groups to support the brief, and resolved to support and publicize the event within UC.

"It is very encouraging to see students taking an interest in such a very serious problem," Professor Ramsay

Cook, department of history, said last night.

"It is useful and is an intelligent and mature interest," he added.

Professor Paul Fox, department of political economy, said it was a good idea for students to express their feelings on the subject.

"The brief is well worded and quite reasonable," he said.

The march will begin at 1 p.m., Nov. 22, when students are asked to gather in front of Soldiers' Tower. They will be briefly addressed by Doug Ward before marching over to the Parliament buildings, where Ward will present the brief to Premier Robarts.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Advocates Quebec planning

Economic expansion through government control would improve the living standards in Quebec, David Lewis told an audience of about 130 Wednesday.

Mr. Lewis, federal vice-president of the NDP and former MP for York South, was speaking to a meeting sponsored by the campus New Democrats.

He said the real cause of Quebec's present concern is economic. Mr. Lewis warned that if extremist demands, such as control of exports and customs were granted to Quebec, Canada would become a kind of "League of Nations."

But if English Canada recognizes and meets the valid French Canadian demands, namely, economic and cultural equality with the rest of the country, he said, then Canada will be more united and will have a more solid foundation than ever before.

"The Royal Commission on Biculturalism is a slow step in the right direction," Mr. Lewis said.

Aid earthquake victims

The Macedonian Relief Committee is appealing to University of Toronto students to aid the earthquake victims of Skopje.

They need taggers this Saturday for the tag day being held for the stricken city.

Anyone interested in taking part in the campaign is asked to call either WA. 5-9181 or 922-5622.

student action

We often hear of students expressing their belief that the individual can do little to implement change within today's complex society.

The students who hold these beliefs usually have a concern for some aspect of our social milieu and wish they, as individuals, could do something to rectify what they consider to be an undesirable situation.

But they feel that the forces of the status quo, the establishment and the massive social structure make their efforts insignificant and futile.

To act, an individual must have enough knowledge about the situation he is concerned with to enable him to proceed with certainty.

He must then have a moral and personal commitment to the issue concerning him. He must be prepared to involve himself, no matter what results such involvement might create.

If he is fortunate he will be aware of possible repercussions, but often he will still be confronted with reactions that will tend to undermine his stand. If he is morally and intellectually committed he will be able to withstand these pressures.

And, finally, he needs some assurance of the possibility of success. This aspect requires a faith in the capacities of rationale and reason of his fellow men.

We can understand why students do not act. Today many of the important issues are obscured by the clash of political, social and religious ideologies.

The individual is faced with a surfeit of opinions and arguments. From these he must try and elicit the facts, which appear to change and multiply almost daily.

But occasionally someone tackles an issue, acquaints himself with the circumstances, commits himself and acts. He stands on the horizon to register his protest and state the direction which he wishes the change to take.

If the individual's actions and ideas have relevance and appeal he will gain support. He will find that others hold the same ideas as he, and that they are willing to join him. With enough support the existing situation can be changed.

This week some students on this campus have acted. They have decided that they, as individuals and students, have something to say concerning the relationship between the French and English-speaking Canadians.

A few weeks ago these students felt they could do very little to influence the course of political events which may make or break this country.

But they decided they would try, and in trying they discovered there were many others who were also willing to act.

If enough students are prepared to inform themselves during the next week they will have a basis for action. If these students are prepared to commit themselves at least to march on Queen's Park they will be taking part in vital and important social action.

In acting these students will find that they are not impotent and that the complex society in which they live is not as unmovable as it once appeared.

And most important, they should be able to prove to themselves that the individual is still a vital force in our society.

Views on Remembrance Day

The following letters, on pages 4 and 13, are a representative sample of the more than 100 letters received by The Varsity in response to the front page editorial of Nov. 11.

remember

As I write this it is Remembrance Day; it seems that Remembrance Day took quite a dressing down from the local intellectuals, and I must admit that I am not entirely unsympathetic to their criticism, though I cannot endorse it completely. Like a lot of other people, I bought a small artificial poppy from a smiling, wrinkled veteran with enough medals to pass for a bullet-proof vest.

You see, on Remembrance Day I remember some slightly different things from what most people remember. I remember that if ever there is another war there will be no more Remembrance Days. For me it is a reminder that mankind may not be granted another mistake.

However, as I wandered aimlessly about the campus, I stumbled upon the elaborate Remembrance Day ceremony at Soldiers' Tower. A couple of minutes were enough to convince me that we remember the wrong things on Remembrance Day. The service, I am sorry to say, was a colossal whitewash. No responsibility, no fear, no sense of warning. Only praise for "the ultimate sacrifice for one's country".

In the far-distant technological past (1939) it was no doubt possible and logical for a few young men to achieve something by making the ultimate sacrifice for one's country. No one mentioned that the same action today is assured of producing the "ultimate sacrifice of one's country".

I slipped the poppy into my pocket and said to my neighbor: "Now they are abolished; they are ready to try it again but this time it will be different." He seemed puzzled so I walked away.

It is now the 13th, and I have just come from the SAC meeting where the comedy team of Tan and Seltan tried to undermine the freedom of the press.

God save us from nuclear-age patriots!

John S. Cowan (III UC)

remember

They were there, Mr. Editor. They were all there, one of each. Mr. Bissell, "honorary head of the COTC." Old ladies, grey, with kleenex — you imagined that their sons' names might have been under the arch. Old men, some of the bums you see around campus almost anytime. Some of them who will sometime in the next week make a trip to Sunnybrook for medicine or a medical check-up of a body that is past any real help. Students, some of them there because one always goes to Remembrance Day services; some of them because the little lady in the Arbor Room had table-wiped them right out the door and you could hardly avoid the crowd, especially if you tried to slip upstairs. Some of them went cynically to look on the "grotesque custom." Some of them went out of curiosity about their own feelings. And, notably, you went too, Mr. Editor.

Anyway, it was just the right kind of day — clear, and just a little cold. It should have been cold. The dead we were supposed to remember were undoubtedly very cold. So we stood there and we all thought about something.

I thought about the writers in the Varsity who had it just a little wrong. They blamed the organizations of war. They held "partially responsible . . . those . . . in a position to shape the opinions and feelings of the common man." Does that include us? It should. It should include me, for one. I am a student — one of the thousands of students on this campus, now and in 1919 and 1939. I blame myself because I wanted to do something and I didn't. I wanted to stand there at the end of that ceremony and sing very softly "We shall overcome . . . we shall overcome . . ." and I wanted the people around me to pick it up. And I wanted every student in that audience to stand and sing. Not in memory, but out of memory and out of hope for ourselves.

There is no hope for the people who hold that ceremony. They are the Organization in our society. I think that they have done, on the whole, a good job. They responded to the pressures of the Organization of their own day and did many things. They built this university; they died in two world wars. If they needn't have done some of these things, don't lash out at them now. They stand there in tears. Fight, if you will, the Becoming. Fight the students of 1918, 1945, and 1963. Fight against them and for what they might have been. The poor bastards under the arch are dead. We aren't. The torch we have to carry is not theirs it is our own. If we are to be worth remembering as they are, then it has to be a bright one.

We must overcome.

Don Black (Spec. UC)

remember

The editorial for Remembrance Day which appeared on the front page Monday is probably the most revolting piece of snivelling drivel The Varsity has published in a decade. Yes, Mr. Editor, we too are against sin, but evil exists, and must be extirpated by the means available to men of this world. Force, the only means which we can exercise in the last extremity, when we have to fight for all we have and for all we have worked through the millennia against organized evil, is justifiable when it is the only solution.

Sure, it would be lovely discussions by idealists like yourself could take the place of war, or if the goodness and idealism of all men matched yours and war was unthinkable, but let's face facts. Unfortunately, your editorial is totally invalid in the context of existing humanity. Change humans for the better, for the perfect, and then you and all the pink vermin like you will come into your own. But for the moment, let us turn instead to the editorial of Nov. 9, 1962, and take our inspiration from it.

Contemptuously yours,
Peter S. Jull (II Vic)

Sir: I strongly resent your remarks concerning the University Naval Training Division in Monday's editorial entitled "No place here". You rely solely on hearsay evidence, and the presentation of your argument reflects a complete lack of understanding of the purpose of military service today. It is common sense that the best way to insure peace is to maintain a strong and efficient military force, to discourage any potential aggressor.

For that purpose, the Navy seeks recruits with a University education in order to provide top quality leadership in our Reserve Forces. These recruits are not taught "how to kill"; they are taught military discipline, how to accept it and how to enforce it, and they are occasionally reminded that they are no longer a part of High School Cadet Training, but are faced with the slim possibility of some day having to step in to lead men at war.

Perhaps you are right when you say that "the aims of military organizations and the aims of an intellectual and academic community are quite different"; yet the recruiting is done on a purely voluntary basis, and nothing says that a student is committed to further his military career should it interfere with his academic progress. Those who are at present active are proud to belong to a fine organization, which teaches them self-confidence, leadership qualities, and organization, and they can do without the degrading

Provincial conference may be Canada's most crucial

The Dominion-Provincial Conference opening in Ottawa on Mon. Nov. 25 could be the most crucial in Canadian history.

A vigorous Quebec will attend the meeting as a last chance for Confederation. If Lesage does not get the reasonable concessions to which French Canada is entitled, the moderate voices of Quebec will be silenced. Then English Canada will be left to face the extremists.

Stated simply, French Canada wants greater fiscal autonomy and a new spirit in Confederation based on equality between the French and English cultures.

Lesage is not simply pulling these demands out of his hat. He is responding to very real political pressure from the same nationalist forces that swept him into office in 1960.

Pierre Laporte and Rene Levesque the two most powerful ministers in the Quebec cabinet have warned that French Canada must get a new deal or go her own way.

In this tense situation Mr. Roberts is in many ways the key man in Canada. He is the premier of the largest province. His is the strongest provincial voice in English Canada. His co-operation with Prime Minister Pearson and Premier Lesage could be crucial.

None of this is really new to us except perhaps for the imminence of the danger. We know that a crisis is near and have known it for some time — but what can we do. We are merely individuals.

But are we powerless. We are students of the largest university in English Canada. We are members of the generation that will have to find a modus vivendi with our peers in French Canada.

Students in Quebec have been active in the Confederation question for several years. It is time for us to convert the monologue into a dialogue.

We must demonstrate before the whole country our concern for the future of Canada. We must demonstrate to French Canadians that we are aware and sympathetic — that we truly recognize them as our partners in Confederation.

We have the facts and the responsibility is ours. The Canadian/Canadian Committee of the SAC can serve as the means of action on this campus. But the members of the committee are not enough. The student body of the university must support the steps that are to be taken, if the actions of the committee are to be meaningful.

The Canadian/Canadian Committee has prepared a brief to present to Premier Roberts on Nov. 22 on the subject of the Dominion-Provincial Conference. In this brief the committee has expressed the concern of the student body at a critical moment in Canadian history. The brief has already been accepted by a wide body of campus organizations and support for the presentation was pledged unanimously by the SAC on Wednesday night.

All that remains to end the long silence of English Canada is wide participation.

All students are urged to assemble before the Soldiers' Tower next Friday at 1 p.m. Doug Ward, the President of the SAC, will then address the students on the purposes of the march.

Those who support the principles stated will be asked to accompany the brief to Queen's Park for presentation to the Premier.

By devoting a few minutes of our lunch hour we can express our concern on the greatest question facing Canada today.

Fair play for Quebec

In this article R. S. Blair of the Department of Political Economy provides a thoroughgoing explanation of the issues involved in the upcoming dominion-provincial conference.

The dominion-provincial conference which will commence in Ottawa on November 25th is clearly of vital importance for the survival of Confederation.

It is the second item on the agenda that will probably highlight the present crisis, since that is to be a discussion of federal conditional grants and shared cost programs. This will inevitably involve dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements generally. In order to understand what is involved in this conference it is necessary to give a brief resume of some previous developments.

The BNA Act of 1867 divided legislative powers between federal and provincial jurisdictions and it provided what appeared to be the necessary financial resources for each far authority to exercise its power. Thus the federal government was empowered to raise revenue "by any mode or system of taxation," while the provincial governments were given various minor revenues, subsidies from the federal government, and the power to levy direct taxes "within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes".

Thus the Federal government was not prohibited from levying direct taxation, but in 1867 it was not anticipated that either federal or provincial authorities would employ this highly unpopular form of taxation, the most obvious examples of which today are personal and corporation income taxes and succession duties. By far the most lucrative source of revenue in these days was indirect taxation, consisting chiefly of customs and excise duties and this was given exclusively to the federal government.

Now what has happened is this: The tasks given to the provinces in 1867 have become far more expensive than was anticipated, since they include such matters, generally speaking, as social welfare, education and highways. Thus they needed far more revenue than they actually had and it seemed that the solution to this lay in the provinces exercising their right to levy direct taxes, which in this century have far outstripped indirect taxes as sources of governmental revenue. The provinces, therefore, started, albeit cautiously, to levy various forms of direct taxation. Even so, a number of provinces were always chronically short of revenue and were constantly demanding "better terms" from the federal government.

So matters stood until the First World War when the dominion government found that it needed more revenue if it was to prosecute the war, and thus in 1917 it proceeded to levy direct taxes. Since that time it has never retreated from the field of direct taxation and indeed has asserted a prior right to that of the provinces in this field.

The most significant developments, however, took place during and after the Second World War, when an attempt was made, on the initiative of the federal government, to rationalize the "taxation jungle" which had existed during the depression years of the 1930s. What eventually emerged in 1947 was the "tax-rental" system, which lasted until the last year. Under this system any province that wished to make an agreement with the federal government could "rent" the use of three major direct taxes — personal and corporation income taxes, and succession duties — to the federal government, and in return for abstaining from levying these taxes the province would receive back a proportion of the amount collected in the province from these taxes (the "rent") from the federal government. At the time of expiry of the last of these agreements in 1962 this proportion was 13 per cent of personal income tax, 9 per cent of Corporation Taxes, and 50 per cent of succession duties — thus the formula was 13-9-50.

A second and highly important aspect of this system was that the federal government also gave equalization payments to the provinces and these were designed essentially to give every province a revenue that was proportionately as high as the amount of "rent" obtained by the two wealthiest provinces, which happened to be British Columbia and Ontario. Ontario only entered these schemes in 1952 and then only partially, while Quebec never entered at all. Nevertheless, Quebec received equalization payments and also a tax abatement on the federal taxes in order that it might levy its own.

This scheme was replaced by another in 1962 which was supposed to continue until 1966-7. Under this new arrangement equalization payments continue, although they are computed on a somewhat different fashion, and provinces can under certain circumstances leave the matter of tax collection in the hands of the federal authorities. All provinces except Quebec have in fact chosen to do this. It is a matter of doubt whether these arrangements will survive until 1966.

Now the difficulties raised by these developments are very considerable. All the provinces, but particularly Quebec and Ontario, have at various times claimed that the federal government had no justification in remaining in the direct tax field after the war-time emergencies had passed. All the provinces can present good cases for more revenue either by securing increased sums from the federal government or by being permitted a larger measure of direct taxation themselves. Now, of course, the federal government has not been without reasons as to why it ought to have the lion's share of direct taxation. It is required if there is to be an adequate federal fiscal policy; it is required in order that the federal government can channel funds from the "have" provinces to the "have-nots"; it is required in order that the federal government may institute national programs in such areas as social welfare, etc.

The provinces, however, especially, Ontario and Quebec, claim that the federal government is using its taxation power to encroach on provincial powers and that a proper federal system demands that the provinces be allowed to raise their own revenues for their own purposes.

For what has happened is that the federal government has used its fiscal powers to enter indirectly upon matters which by the constitution are under provincial jurisdiction. It has employed the devices of the shared cost program

Graduates in higher education!

The pilots who wear TCA wings are capable, confident men, many of whom have thousands of hours of flying experience. But, they still have to write periodic examinations. And take refresher courses covering the complex flight procedures of modern aviation. Even have their flying skills checked four times a year in flight simulators which cost as much as a million dollars, yet never get an inch off the ground. TCA pilots, however, don't mind these examinations. They know the minute they stop having them, they're grounded. □ When you get on the move in the business world—or if you're travelling for pure, 'plane pleasure, go TCA. It's who's "up front" that counts—and TCA has the finest!

and the conditional grant for this purpose. What happens in the latter is that where a particular matter is under the control of the provinces the federal government will give the provinces financial assistance to carry out various projects in these areas subject to certain conditions. This has happened frequently in such areas of provincial jurisdiction as social welfare and education. The provinces claim that this is contrary to

If London is the urinal of the gods, Paris must be Satan's cesspool.

One Canadian newspaper man in Paris with me for last year's NATO ministers' conference remarked that Paris would be a fine place if there was some way of getting rid of all the filthy, grasping Parisians.

He was half right. The city isn't worth much either.

Some people find Paris romantic even after they've been there. Larry Garber's articles in this newspaper from the Latin Quarter indicate he either missed things I saw or saw things I missed. He likes Paris.

It is an absurd city. The image that expresses Paris best for me is the Place d'Etoile with its central Arc de Triomphe and its roads running out like spokes. One road is the Champs Elysee. Straight as a string, it probes the Place de la Concord. The French obsession with mathematics and precision is there.

But cars filled with shrieking Parisians savagely mesh around the Arc de Triomphe with no apparent design. In the middle stands a gendarme, waving his hands nonchalantly and saying softly: "Ne fachez pas."

But we must give the Parisians (or, perhaps, Parisites) their due. What other race could have invented the lavatory in may hotel? The only way to turn on the light was by locking the door from the inside—thus assuring that you safely lock yourself away from the prurient-minded French chambermaids; and that you cannot leave the light on when you are finished.

THE TOILET WAS CUNNING

But within that same cunningly-organized toilet was a roll of examples of another side of the French mind. The roll was very hard and colored dark brown. Not only did it not perform its function very well but, because of the color, you could never be sure whether it had actually performed its function.

Into the Metro. More contradictions. A sign:

"ATTENTION: Ces banquettes sont reserves par priorite premiere aux mutiles de guerre; deuxieme aux aveugles civils, aux invalides du travail et aux infirmes civils troisieme aux femmes enceintes et aux personnes accompagnes d'enfants ages de moins de 4 ans."

But nothing could better mutilate a war veteran than the car doors which clang together viciously, quite without warning, and then display a sign: "LES TRAVEUX — Il ya danger de MORT!"

At NATO headquarters there was a security check at the door the like of which I have never experienced. That seemed fair. After all, NATO is alleged to be our greatest defence against the Communists. But the Tass and Pravda men were admitted anyway.

AND THE PISSOIRES REEKED

The smell of the pissoires posits a dirty city. It's citizens have similar minds. Which brings us, of course, to sex.

Normal sex bores Parisians. Crusty, masculine women and lithe, mincing men in the streets worried me. How close can the two sexes grow together without overlapping—passing silently on a hot summer night?

The inevitable small, dark Frenchman approached two Canadian reporters: Feelthy pictures, m'sieu being out of style, he asked in a perfect New York accent: "Photographs, sir?"

"Non, allez-vous en."

"Girls, then, monsieurs?"

"Non."

He sidled closer and said quietly: "Boys, then?"

"Non!!! Go away!"

He threw up helpless and uncomprehending hands: "Well, what do you want, alligators?"

Shrewdly a reporter said: "Yes, we want alligators."

'No monsieur,' he giggled, "that would be dirty."

But if we had pressed him . . .

Sex is organized too, and always has been in Paris. In de Sade's Juliette the heroine tells of experiences with some Roman Catholic nuns. In the middle of a lesbian orgy when several of the women are about to fall on each other, a nun approaches Juliette.

"He head reeling from sublimest drunkenness, Delbene bore me to her bed and devoured me with her kisses.

"One moment," she panted, wholly ablaze, 'one moment, my dears, we had best introduce a little method into our pleasures' madness; they're not relished unless organized."

But maybe I'm prejudiced. I do, I must admit, think often about the Battle of Hastings and St. Bartholomew's Massacre.

Listen to jazz! Listen to lectures! Listen to the jokes you told last summer! There are dozens of ways to listen with the Philips Collegiate Trio. (Ten are shown here. Can you spot them?) And who are the Philips Collegiate Trio? Hint #1: They all run on ordinary flashlight batteries. Hint #2: You can take them with you anywhere.

1) Philips pocket portable transistor AM/FM radio — Great sound from a transistor radio only 3 1/2 inches high! AM & FM, 8 transistor circuit, big sound speakers. The world's smallest AM/FM Radio. Other models available.

2) Philips Continental '100 tape recorder — Take the music with you . . . bring your good tunes home on a Philips Continental '100 Tape Recorder. You get fabulous sound from a portable tape recorder that only weighs 8 pounds. Records 2 hours per tape.

3) Philips all-transistor portable record player — Play all sizes of records, all 3 speeds on portable record player just 7 1/4 wide by 4 1/4 high! Transistorized, complete with amplifier & loudspeaker. Great sound reproduction!

What Do You Want In A Company After Graduation?

Graduates who've been out a few years say the important things to look for in choosing a job are good training, an unrestricted chance to grow in a solid, recognized company, income, early responsibility and a stimulating environment where intelligence and enthusiasm are recognized. The points are not always in that order, but these are the main ones. What, then can Procter & Gamble offer you?

1. An outstanding record of individualized, on-the-job training.
2. Responsibilities and promotion based on a man's ability — not on how long he's been around.
3. A growth company which controls 30% — 60% of all the major product markets in which it competes; at least one of our brands is in 95% of all Canadian households.
4. Among other benefits, highly competitive salaries and profit sharing.

Obviously, you need to know facts before making an intelligent choice of your career. We'd like to tell you more about us. Descriptive brochures are available at the Placement Office and company representatives will visit for interviews on

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

Some people live their whole lives in the quarter with their trunks in the hall. Its the illusion of transit that's important. Don't use all the drawers, leave your clock on the suitcase, pay by the week, never change your pajamas. I came to the City Hote on the Ile de la Cite; it is within crawling distance of Odeon and just far enough from the heart of the Quarter to deceive one into thinking it is safe.

I took the last room on the top floor in the farthest corner and the windows looked out onto the hall. Across the way, a girl lay in her little bed reading the embroidery on her pillow slips. I pushed my stuff into a wall and lay down, fatigued and drenched with a mid-afternoon sweat. I didn't give a damn for the villa anymore or the hotel or the room and stretched out on the coverlet, waiting for the feeling to go away. The girl hardly moved to my noise. Her dull green trunk had been in the hall for ten years. She had a small glass of water on a tiny night table. She went out for her meals late at night and they brought up her breakfast in the mornings. I never saw her face, although she was always so close I could have touched her. She believed in the trunk laying in the slanted hallway and there was room for no other arguments in her life. Because she could leave tomorrow, she didn't have to. I hadn't mastered her secret then, but she had escaped as surely and as easily as it was possible to do.

A TERRIFYING ESCAPE

The quarter is the zone of escape -- time and crises are destroyed so simply that it is terrifying. While I lay in bed trying to sleep through the heat, my head full of this and that, none of it pleasant, I didn't know this yet. She seemed completely mad reading her linen and her walls; but she made it, she was deep in the finest rut of all and it was something to envy.

I remind myself of another story that comes later. One day I was waiting in line for my mail at the American Express and fell into conversation with a coloured boy, Clayard Duncan. I had just come back from Barcelona and we began to talk about it. He had been there a couple of years before me and had lived in the same hotel, the Pension Toledo. That is near the Plaza Real, a kind of relocated Latin Quarter for Quarter travellers who do not want to leave their lives behind them. He had stayed there for a year, in that old part of the city with its depressing walls and smells. A year in Barcelona? How did he manage it, the nasty heat and the slow, steady decay of almost everything you bring with you. Well, he had wanted to stay for three weeks, that was his plan, but something happened. He couldn't get out. Every afternoon he'd wake up at noon with sore eyes and his bed almost drenched with sweat. He'd roll himself a point of marijuana and then go down into the Plaza for breakfast. At noon all the stores closed, of course, and the drinking agencies didn't open again until four. By four, he was drinking wine and lemon. By nightfall it was too late, and then there would be his mail to-morrow, and so he spent his evening in the blue note café.

WAITING FOR TOMORROW

Day after day he failed to make it. Before going to bed early in the mornings, he would make the plan to get up at ten and take care of his tickets and pack his bags and be gone by noon. Everyday he woke up at noon, his eyes sore and his sheets soaked with sweat and began to pass through the long ritual of waiting until nightfall when it would be alright again and he could plan for to-morrow without hurting. Weeks went by -- months. He wrote his friends for help and got unsympathetic letters from Paris. He was trapped, he couldn't get out; he dreamt about the train ride back to Paris point by point, his nerves went, he spent whole days in bed in the dark carefully preparing for the next day. And then finally it didn't matter anymore, the longing slipped behind him, and he worked on keeping it there. He was at the Pension Toledo a year.

How did he make it at last? Well, one day at eight in the morning the ceiling of his hotel room caved in; he jumped up, packed his bags, bought his train tickets and was in Paris the next morning.

So months after seeing that girl building her labyrinth across the hall, I came to appreciate it all. Waste is a beautiful art among the natives.

The sound of surprise

By DAVID JACKEL

Toronto being what it is, we were due for a slack period after all the good jazz that has come to town lately. And we now have it, since the groups at the various taverns this week certainly do an excellent job of performing badly. Other points of excellence are almost impossible to find.

What little real jazz there is comes from the cornet of Wild Bill Davison, who has settled in at the Colonial in order to provide the Salt City Six (who share the bandstand) with an inferiority complex. The hornmen in the sextet are all capable musicians, but the group only catches fire when Davison climbs the stand to deliver his full-throated lead lines and solos. Perhaps it catches too much fire, since it is one of the loudest dixieland bands ever put together. Earlier this week, some of the patrons of the Colonial could be seen with hands clapped to their ears in order to avoid being deafened. However, this decibel level should make it quite easy to hear the music over the shouts of the weekend drunks.

Possibly the hornmen are playing loudly in an attempt to drown out the drummer, who is noisy, corny, and unswinging. Unfortunately they don't succeed, but their combined efforts do effectively drown out the pianist and the bass player in the ensembles. This is partially a bad thing, since the pianist does manage an occasional good solo, and it would be nice to hear what he's doing the rest of the time. The bass player (who also honks a tuba when he feels that things are getting too quiet) makes his presence felt in the mayhem by screaming.

Through this barrage of sound emerge occasional listenable moments provided by the pianist, clarinetist Jack Maheu, and trombonist Will Alger, but the best work comes from Davison. His solos on such numbers as I'm Confessin', Memories of You, and the old Spenser Williams classic, I Ain't Gonna Give Nobody None of this Jelly Roll, represent the only really creative jazz that this group can produce in the dixieland idiom.

BAD SINGERS, GOOD COLLOCOTT

Elsewhere singers dominate the scene. Carol Sloane, who was discussed here last week, continues at the Town. She's derivative enough, but Amanda Ambrose, now at the Friars, is even worse.

Miss Ambrose has the vocal ability, but hasn't yet made up her mind which way to go. The influences of Ella Fitzgerald, Carmen Macrae, Nina Simone, Della Reese and numerous others are readily apparent, sometimes all in the same song. She also has a tendency to sing at times in a very flat, uninflected tone, almost as if she couldn't decide who to imitate next. Miss Ambrose also provides some of her own accompaniment. Her piano playing won't scare anybody either.

At Hart House this week, Tony Collocott and his quintet played very well, especially Collocott and tenor saxophonist Gary Morgan. The program ranged from an old Bud Powell tune, Dance of the Infidels, through a ballad medley which included a good Morgan solo on Lover Man, to a Charlie Mingus composition of a few years back, Fables of Faubus.

This last number provided the one dead spot in the concert, since only the solos by Morgan and bassist Gary Binstead managed to capture the acid incisiveness and profanity which Mingus imparted to this indictment of the racist governor.

Collocott himself could cut almost any pianist in Toronto except Oscar Peterson, and his only fault is that sometimes he plays too much, a natural failing because of his prodigious technique. Drummer Don Vickery, who is good but somewhat loud, and trombonist Bob Angus (a regular with the Fred Duligal group) completed the quintet.

THE SOUND OF THINGS TO COME

The Salt City Six and Amanda Ambrose will be around next week, but the local scene will be brightened considerably by the arrival of Horace Silver and his group. The Silver quintet will be playing from Monday through Saturday at the First Floor Club, and should provide their patented brand of gutty, hard-swinging modern jazz.

Pianist Silver is one of the best arranger-composers active today. Among his compositions are the family of musical characters he has created over the years, such portraits as those of Juicy Lucy, Senior Blues, Filthy McNasty, The Dragon Lady, and Sister Sadie. The quintet version of the latter tune is vastly superior to the rendition made popular in the last year by the Woody Herman band.

Silver's quintet includes the much-improved tenor saxist Junior Cook, bassist Eugene Taylor, drummer Roy Brooks, and the excellent trumpet work of Blue Mitchell, who proves that lyricism still has a place in modern jazz.

A final note for those interested in music related to jazz. John Lee Hooker, one of the best blues singers, is performing at the Establishment this weekend, and is worth hearing because this type of singing is more closely related to the work of a modern jazzman like Horace Silver than some people seem to realize. Hooker is also worth hearing simply because he is very good, although his talent has been submerged by all the garbage played and written as a result of the current "folk-music" insanity.

(Raymond Tripp is a teaching fellow at University College. In an interview with Varsity columnist Alan Walker last week he expressed views usually termed "rightwing" to balance the volume of leftwing sentiment on this campus. Here Mr. Tripp deals more fully with some matters touched on in Walker's column.)

By RAYMOND TRIPP

I can not entirely dispel the feeling that my entering into a discussion of political and moral problems at this university is not a little indiscreet; I am not a Canadian, nor a sophomore, and look upon Toronto as my academic host. Thus, at the very outset, it should be understood that I write only with the greatest deference to the integrity of the members of this academic community.

At the same time, however, since the object of my remarks is larger than national idiosyncrasy, I entertain great confidence that my refusal to allow courtesy to determine my philosophy will be understood.

The occasion of Mr. Walker's interviewing my so-called "rightist" views has placed me in this situation which frankly I find embarrassing, for I am too busy removing the lumber from my own vision to play the spiritual optometrist to others. And, further, what I would say, had I the capacity, has indeed been said many times, and ably.

In this view the prospect which today offers is especially dismal, since the cyclical restatement of Truth seems to have had precious little effect on the course of Western culture, when, in fact, it seems to have accelerated the process of degeneration into self and matter and hastened the abandonment of spiritual values for those of the (Coleridgean) understanding.

An "old book" describes the devil as legion, that is to say, error as relative and particular; and it is altogether too easy a thing to fall into the trap of particular, point-for-point refutation of current mistakes.

This would be to become like that man who reminds himself hourly that he must not sin. And, since ignorance, in the last analysis, or for that matter what we may falsely regard as truth, is nothing but an index of our own moral and spiritual condition—for it is our lives that warp our logic and render us incapable of piercing the subtle walls of dialectical error—, anything I would have to say, had I the power to translate my knowledge into words, could not escape this paradoxical limitation of communication.

As Bacon put it: "... but those whose conceits are beyond popular opinion have a double labor; the one to make themselves conceived, and the other to prove and demonstrate: so that it is of necessity with them to have recourse to similitudes and translations to express themselves." It is, in a word, my aim to demonstrate that this present matter involves the first level of Bacon's dialectical dichotomy.

The business of communism and socialism is in reality a moral mistake, a misunderstanding of the nature of man and his destiny, and not a matter of particulars. It is, therefore, foolish and futile to argue methodology with those whose lives have brought them to these perverted ideologies. The very dichotomy of "rightist" and "leftist" harbors a hidden confusion of the true opposition of good and evil. I would never defend my views as "rightist," but as right.

I see that these present comments have been anticipated by Mr. Sheps, who seems more concerned about rhetorical "bogeysmen" than I. But beyond this, and other mistakes, Mr. Sheps does assist me in reducing the conflict between right and wrong to its essential term. It is precisely the debate concerning that supposedly "unfallen part to our nature" that the question of communism and socialism (as manifestations of a common attitude) pertains. Consistently, only by denying this distinction, between good and evil and between man's erected wit and infected will can a man throw the remains of his soul into the construction of the physical heaven on earth.

No one will deny that it is difficult to be good when one is hungry; that is the work of saints. But the elevation of material concerns into a religion is no solution. And when we have succeeded in destroying the will toward supra-material goals, we will have paradoxically also destroyed the only justification for material goals.

What concerns me is the trickery with which this fundamental cleavage is passed over. Once and if one has consciously decided that man is rises like incense from the altars of progress, to be applied as a spiritual deodorant by those who in their political devotions have not time to pause and wash their souls now and then. And the university itself has been redefined as a revolutionary instrument whose purpose is to change society, not to preserve the accomplishments of the past.

But I apologize for my rhetoric; it is easy to succumb to one's vain indignation, especially when one perceives clearly how many young minds are deceived into the identification of moral and effective behavior with political action.

They do not realize that it is not their prerogative to scamper off and nourish some seminar nation, but, to the contrary, to bring order and good governance to the little nation which they themselves are.

How many of our world-savers are gluttons, lechers, etc., throughout the still deadly list? How many are in effect spiritual schizophrenics unable to control the subjective civil war within themselves, and who, while they spend their energies on causes, accept the tranquilizers proffered by that new Pandarus, psychiatry?

I make this point now, while I may, for certainly in a few brief years morality itself will become a problem for the "mental health" gang, and it will be a "sickness" to profess any but official attitudes, especially anything so wild and primitive as the righteous war.

I would propose (excuse my presumption) for sincere persons one test. Whenever you are asked to listen to some enlightened speaker or to participate in an equally enlightened and benevolent cause, first ask yourself: where does this path ultimately lead? Toward greater control over a God-less world, or to greater wisdom and self-knowledge?

If you do not put this or a similar question, most likely in the name of goodness itself you will be tricked into leaping over the primary question of good and evil; you will have lost the greatest battle in the world; you will have become a living statistic of Mr. K.'s boast: "We'll bury you."

"Our whole life is startlingly moral. There is never an instant's truce between virtue and vice." To consciously deny these sentiments of Thoreau is one thing, though a foolish thing, but to be tricked into an implicit rejection of them unaware is another thing.

Those who partake of the various forms of institutionalized materialism will never give you the opportunity to decide one way or the other—their eggs are already in a very fragile basket called flesh. And:—

"A gross error it is to think that regal power ought to serve for the good of the body and not for the soul, for men's temporal peace and not for their eternal safety: as if God had ordained kings for no other end and purpose but only to fat up men like hogs and to see that they have their mast."

And, though commissars have replaced kings, I do not see that the essential truth of this statement has been altered by the few years which have transpired since Hooker wrote it.

I sincerely hope I have not disappointed any person who expected a polemic and is now of the opinion that he has received something else. And again I sincerely apologize for my indiscretion, but in this I will cry history and claim that it is a liability of contemporary life in general that wretchedness is the occasion of our virtue.

nothing more than an innocent animal capable of certain refinements, why then the materialist position is the only consistent one. Is the undergraduate at this university given a fair chance to make the profound choice? I personally do not believe so.

I can not, when I taste the fruit which now dangles in contemporary academic groves. Just the other day a handbill came to my attention which advertised Marxism with all the un-Godly vigor of the commercial huckster peddling a new detergent.

This announcement was filled with philosophical error, not to mention direct, factual untruths. Myriad pseudo-intellectual activities invade the student's mind; indeed they complain of losing their audience when he graduates!

And in some quarters the smell of philanthropy

Bissell on former Harvard president:

By CLAUDE BISSELL

The Age of The Scholar, by Nathan Pusey, Harvard University Press; 1963.

For the most part, when presidents speak, they do so as professional apologists or zealous mendicants. Even when the occasion is less constricting—a convocation, or an address to a graduating class—there is little opportunity for solid, sustained argument; for the audience is a mixed one, the air is charged with protocol, and it is more discreet to soothe than to irritate.

It is unlikely then, that even the best presidential speeches will make up a genuine book. All that one can expect is a journal—a record of major educational events.

This is perhaps warrant enough for publication, provided the speaker has a genuine and authentic voice and his words come clearly and directly from the mind and heart. Herein lies the justification for The Age of the Scholar, which is a selection of President Pusey's speeches made between the time of his appointment as President at Harvard University in 1953 and the present. The journalistic value of the book is emphasized by the modestly phrased sub title, "Observations on Education in a Troubled Decade".

President Pusey has two main themes: the relationship between knowledge and faith, and the university as a source of creative and critical ideas. The first is the subject of his initial formal address at Harvard, given at the opening convocation of the Harvard Divinity School in September, 1953. It aroused at the time a good deal of comment, simply by reason of the fact that a Harvard president had chosen the Divinity School as the platform for his first major public utterance.

In this speech Pusey gently but strongly dismembers the aggressive secularism of his great predecessor, Eliot. Subsequent treatments of the same theme lack the precision and point of the opening speech.

Of much more interest is his treatment of the second theme—the university as a source of creative and critical ideas. Here he speaks frequently against the background of interfering hysteria that swept into the universities in the wake of the McCarthyite disease. He returns again to the theme in what is perhaps the most effective piece in the book, addressed to the Harvard alumni and delivered in 1961 under the title of "Harvard's Purpose". This is a defence of Harvard, and specifically of the Harvard Department of Economics, against alumni criticisms that the department was given over to the dogmatic expression of left-wing authoritarianism.

represented in the department, and then goes on to point out how a great university derives its strength from the diversity of points of view and the scholarly vigour with which they are expressed.

One of the incidental advantages of the American affluence that Canadians are accustomed to deplore is that it can sustain great private universities, of which, of course, Harvard is the exemplar. Even though these private universities now derive either directly or indirectly much support from the state, they still live and flourish in magnificent independence. They are, as it were, kingdoms of the mind that cannot be taken by storm. They may be guilty, on oc-

ART

By PAUL RUSSELL

The Fifth Biennial Exhibition of Canadian Painting, after opening early this summer in London, England, has now reached London, Ont. — one of its first stops in its tour across Canada. London is only a two-hour drive from Toronto and the exhibition is really very good as a cross-section of the best in contemporary Canadian Art.

The Biennial has in its relatively short life, quickly become the big prestige show on the national level. Artists who have this show behind them are usually ready to be shown on an international level.

Ronald Spickett was, for this writer, the most impressive of the newer artists. A native Westerner, he has studied in Calgary and Toronto, and travelled in Mexico and Japan. At present he lives in Calgary.

His large canvas Maternal Figure is the work of a talented artist who really knows his media — both its possibilities and its limitations. Mr. Spickett has combined a simplicity in color range (Mainly green and yellow), with a complexity of line and area which in its combination is fascinating.

The work is symbolic — various features and images of the female are built up into a structure rich in human feeling and yet serenely rational in its composition.

All of the various established reputations in international styles are represented too. They range from the completely free expressionistic action-painting of Ropelle to the cold formalism of Molinari's 'hard-edge' geometrics.

At the DOROTHY CAMERON GALLERY, RITA LETENDRE is still exhibiting here very dramatic red and black canvases. Here one may find all the flashing color, spark and flamboyancy one could wish for. But, Miss Letendre stops there. She has a very sharp style, but this writer doesn't really get the message.

Miss Letendre is sharing the gallery with Albert Dumouchel, whose graphics have a rich earthy texture, reminiscent of rough stone. His compositions are superb. I find the most striking aspect of his works to be their very high decorative value. In contemporary criticism, the term decorative when applied to art, is usually considered insulting. This writer believes the decorative aspect of art to be of great importance. Incidentally, both Letendre and Dumouchel are in the Biennial Exhibition.

The Gallery Dresdnere is exhibiting 19th and 20th century French painting and sculpture. This is a very expensive show; expensive not because of the quality of the works but rather because of the name value that signatures such as Degas and Renoir have acquired. Some pieces are competent, a few are even good, but they certainly do not represent the greatness of such artists as Renoir and Dufy. The show, however, is worth a visit if only to see examples of the technique of each artist.

A painting exhibit by Armand Flint opened at the David Mirvish Gallery Nov. 6 with William Ronald in attendance. He flew up from New Jersey especially for the opening.

The painter's first one-man is thought-provoking, and sometimes satiric. Flint starts with a literal idea and then executes it with the vitality of an action painter. By approaching painting this way, he manages to combine emotion and intellect without losing the essence of either.

The paintings indicate this quality to some extent through their titles. His "Self portrait in the sun through a half closed eye," sun-red, depicts a subtle headless figure. Other works such as "Don Valley Parkway" and "The President Fusey reflects the best in this independent world. He is liberal in spirit, supremely confident of the indestructibility of humane values, a spokesman for the sweet reasonableness that must, alas, rest ultimately on an endowment of many millions.

This is not a major book on education, nor is it meant to be. But in these days when the educational statisticians and bureaucrats are girding up their graphs and their memoranda preparatory to battle, it is a good book for Canadians to read and to ponder.

the spirit of the constitution and is an encroachment on their lawful powers. Quebec in particular has been emphatic on this score and argues that the federal government should give grants unconditionally or preferably, leave the provinces with sufficient taxing power to deal with these matters themselves. The federal government can only secure direct control over these areas by constitutional amendment, and be compensated by the been two of these — unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. It is unlikely that there will be more.

Clearly these difficulties cannot be reduced to a simple "Quebec vs. The Rest" formula. Quebec has never lacked for support, and essentially the division is between the richer provinces and the poorer provinces. Ontario, Quebec, Alberta, and British Columbia perhaps have much to gain from "going it alone"; the others have much to lose.

In the past dominion-provincial conferences concerning these matters have not been a gratifying spectacle; no province wishes to be outdone by another and thus makes as extreme demands as it dares. This process of haggling and mutual recrimination on one particular occasion led the late Onesime Gagnon to describe it as "the most iniquitous piece of bargaining in the annals of Canadian history". The last series of talks in 1960-61 revealed the usual strains. Mr. Frost of Ontario first asked for a 50-50 formula as a long term objective and various other provinces showed interest in this. Premier Lesage asked for 25-25-50, although he maintained that strictly the provinces should get 100 per cent of succession duties since the federal government had no right to levy them. But the provinces did not present a united front and there was clearly the usual anxiety not to let anyone else get a better deal. In the end, therefore, Mr. Diefenbaker was able to negotiate an agreement that was fairly suitable from the viewpoint of the federal government.

Since then the situation has changed considerably. The provinces are hard-pressed for funds and are all anxious to get a bigger share of taxation proceeds. The government in Ottawa is in a weak position in the Commons and thus has to tread carefully. But the most significant development, of course, has been the agitation in Quebec. Quebec has always laid great emphasis upon its autonomy in the field of social welfare and education — indeed it has insisted that it has full jurisdiction in all that relates to its culture in the widest sense of the term, including the economic development of the province. The determination to be mistress in her own house has been strenuously asserted in recent months, as has the view that Quebec is not "a province just like the others". Thus Quebec now is resolved to secure financial terms that will be satisfactory for her purpose. If these are not granted, the outcome can only be a matter of gloomy conjecture.

In his budget speech last April, Mr. Lesage demanded a new arrangement on a 25-25-100 formula. At that time he had this to say: "...either the central government will have taken advantage of the coming 12 months to take into account Quebec's demands or else we of Quebec will have seen to it, during the same period, that we take the inevitable decisions in the fiscal domain. And these decisions will be those dictated for us by the objective of economic, social and cultural affirmation we have fixed ourselves at the very request of the people of Quebec."

Last week in New Orleans Mr. Lesage indicated what position he would take at the forthcoming conference by stating that Quebec intended as soon as possible to end federal-provincial programs of either the shared cost or conditional grant variety and secure from the federal government "fiscal equivalence," so that it might carry out its own programs in these areas as it saw fit. Other Quebec cabinet ministers have spoken in the same strain, although some, notably Mr. Levesque, have indicated that they would like to see the provinces securing complete control over direct taxation. Last Friday, the Quebec youth minister, Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, stated in Toronto that the Quebec Education budget would have to be augmented to $175,000,000 annually until 1967, and that this would require a considerable revision of the present tax agreements.

The problem is clear: how are the demands of Quebec to be satisfied without having the other wealthy provinces jump on the bandwagon, thus placing a severe strain on the finances of the federal government and on those of the poorer provinces which depend heavily upon federal support? A possible solution in one area has been suggested by Mr. Lamontagne — that provinces which so desired could withdraw from joint federal-provincial programs and be compensated by the federal government so that they might continue such programs on their own. On September 30th Mr. Lesage mentioned just such a possibility and Mr. Pearson stated in the Commons on November 8th that the government "would be prepared to consider, with the provinces, withdrawing from these programs in certain circumstances."

It is at this point that the position of Ontario becomes crucial. Ontario contributes half the revenues of the federal government. If Ontario were to demand the same terms as Quebec, then the position of those other provinces which depend heavily on equalization payments would be jeopardized. In the past editorial writers in this province have criticized "the Santa Claus contributions of Ontario" and a general attitude is reflected in a statement from the Globe and Mail in October 1960 that "nine provinces, rich or poor as the case may be, have joyously lapped up the milk taken from the Ontario cow." At previous conferences the representatives of Ontario have been at the head of the column in putting their demands. Premier Robarts has so far given no real indication of what stand he will take at the conference. However, in an interview reported in the Toronto Star concerning the Canada pension plan he is quoted as saying that "if Quebec can opt out of the national scheme so could British Columbia, Alberta, or any of the provinces. If this can be of advantage to Quebec, it might be of tremendous advantage to Ontario also." It is to be hoped that Mr. Robarts does not in fact intend to match Quebec demand for demand and that the position of Quebec is recognized by him as being a very special one. Professor Corry has noted that when Ontario entered the tax-rental scheme, this was "in part at least, due to a recognition of some justice in the claims of the poorer provinces that much of the wealth pooled in the richer provinces is produced by the skill and effort of people in other provinces and that some of it should be redistributed for their benefit. That is to say, Ontario has loyalties that go beyond her boundaries and distract her from any crusade for a self-centred provincial autonomy."

Let the final word be that of the prime minister as he spoke in the House of Commons last Tuesday: "...if the federal government... turns over more and more of the shared fields of taxation, or indeed all of them, to the provinces... then the federal government must either find the money which it has to have from some other source... or it must ask the provinces to take over full responsibility for expenditure now undertaken, in whole or in part, by the federal government... There is a great disparity between riches, resources and, indeed, needs, in one province as opposed to another." What has been accepted is "...the obligation upon the central government to equalize opportunities and benefits by making the financial resources available in a calculated way to the provinces... To keep confederation strong, and to make national unity based on it stable, will require this recognition of the necessity of equalization..." The solution of the problem may lie in the hands of the government of Ontario.

A change from tasteless fiascos

By J. MURRAY

Instead of its usual tasteless fiasco, the University College Follies has actually offered us this year something that approaches a play. Pickwick is not only presentable but even charming, and although not really a "play", it is an astonishing achievement for a college variety show.

The original comic romance by Dickens is fairly faithfully followed though interspersed with rare gems of more modern brilliance (such as "This is their finest hour" and "tis sachie sweet"). Mr. Pickwick, the lovable, generous old gentleman of Dickens' novel, reigns again amidst a bevy of songs handled with a lightly fantastic touch, and a judiciously condensed story line. The writing by Alexander Leggatt and George T. McCallum is delicately witty, and even supremely elegant at times, although it sometimes suffers from strain and lack of unity.

The acting is generally good, even excellent. Paul Soren plays the leading role in an appropriately stately manner but lacks spark in his part. Somehow he is not benevolent enough. Perhaps the main fault is in the writing of his part which is cut too closely and hence, does not allow a certain touselled confusion and King Arthurishness. Susan Wilson puts in a firm performance as Mrs. Bardell but it is George T.

fers a sound interpretation, an excellent voice, and a good deal of charm. Incidentally, it is appropriate that Sam Weller should steal the scenes. Pickwick, originally published as a serial, only began its rise in popularity when the ready, witty and imperturbable Sam was introduced.

Some mis-casting is evident in other roles. Jim St. Lawrence as Jingle cannot manage to overcome a naturally poor voice and an artificially built role. However, Hersh Zeifman and Lorne Lipowitz as the rascally lawyers Dodgson and Fogg meander around the stage with a delightfully light touch, and David Goad puts in a broadly robust appearance as Tony Weller, Sam's father.

The sets designed by John Scott are not only workable, and excellently designed. They lend a certain gaiety and elegance to the play while remaining, at the same time, appropriately casual.

It is, in fact, a good show and fully justifies an evening.

Miss Meen cannot help but gain from his radiance but of concerns must be underwritten; their office (which doubles as a rehearsal room for members) must be maintained; and "Hoot", their bi-monthly magazine, is not yet self-supporting.

Secondly, it will mean the shelving of many imaginative ventures the Embassy is undertaking such as the commissioning of Canadian composer Harry Somers to write a score for poetry by George Miller.

Most important (and alarming) of all, it will mean the barricading of the main avenue to professional folk singing that was open in Toronto. Under union regulations, commercial clubs are no longer permitted to have "guest sets" where amateurs are invited to perform for experience rather than money. Commercial clubs must hire union members.

Embassy threatened by union action

By LINDA HALVERSON

Last Sunday night marked the second cancellation of the regular hoot at the Bohemian Embassy. As Don Cullen, co-owner of the Embassy explained, someone has complained to the Toronto Local of the American Federation of Musicians' Union that the hoots were unfairly competing with commercial clubs.

For a year and a half now, the hoots have been featuring a variety of folk artists, professional and non-professional, on the same programme. No performer is paid and the Guild of Canadian Folk Artists provides the back-stage as well as some of the on-stage labour. Proceeds from the admission price are shared by the Embassy and the Guild.

The hoots have been suspended pending the outcome of a meeting between Allan Wood, President of the Toronto local of the Musicians' Union and a three-member delegation from the Guild.

The underlying issue is more complicated than a twelve-string guitar. It could result in the Embassy having to choose between "going union" or not. To do so would mean that every performer would have to be a union-member and submit a contract in order to perform. Not to do so would mean being "blacklisted" and hence, off-limits for union members.

This is the bigger problem which is etching worry lines on the mobile face of Don Cullen for it would affect many of the other-night activities at the Embassy.

What will it mean if the hoots are permanently dropped?

First, it will cut off the only regular source of income for the Guild—income which has enabled them to stretch out into the fields of research into Canadian folk music and nurture the seeds of an extensive library of books and records. Demands on their limited funds are many. Their

Sandbox good absurd

By ERIC RUMP

One of the ways that the drama of the absurd secures its effects is by parodying the conventions of previous drama. This can be seen fairly clearly in Edward Albee's early play "The Sandbox" now playing at the Women's Union Theatre on St. George St.

Its plot is quite simple. It concerns an old woman, grandma, who is dying in the house of her daughter and son-in-law. She has had a hard life, having lost her husband when she was thirty and having to raise her daughter by herself till she eventually got married. Yet none of this has diminished her vitality — she is a fountain of joy compared with both her daughter and son-in-law. Though they have all the material comforts their lives are empty. They are bored, have nothing to say to one another, and are querulous, hypocritical and sad. They are waiting impatiently for grandma to die, so that they can shed a few false tears over her coffin and then forget all about her.

Clearly this is a plot that could be handled in a number of ways. Even a playwright as recent as Terence Rattigan could have built it up into a 'strong' three-act drama with melodramatic overtones. What Albee has done is to compress it into a brief one-act play and make it humorous by twisting the way it might have been written to his own ends.

This explains the clarinet player and the young man doing calisthenics. Normally the background music for the play is concealed somewhere out of sight, so that it reaches the auditorium as a suggestive means of creating the right emotional mood. But Albee has brought it out in front of us so we can all see what is going on. The Angel of Death would normally only appear as a metaphor, or, if given some actuality, as a series of eerie lighting effects to suggest the presence of the supernatural. Here it is the fit young man who is the worst actor in the show: Young Man.

like a real amateur.) I am the Angel of Death. I am . . . uh . . . come for you.

Also Albee, like Brecht, wishes to create some sort of disassociation effect. He doesn't want us to believe that these are 'real' people or to be so much bound up with them that we cannot stand back and judge them. Consequently he reminds us during the play that these are actors playing parts, and that noises offstage are only noises off stage and not the sound of thunder or the breaking of waves.

All this is competently handled by the Players Guild in this week's offering. Diane Hutton had the difficult part of Grandma, but managed to suggest both her age and her vitality. Dave Kates, as the young man, had the right amount of well-intentioned incompetence. Matt Cohen and Michelle Kraemar were the daughter and son-in-law, and Brian Barley was on clarinet. Direction is in the secure hands of Ray Wylie. It is on display till Friday.

Sound of Music off key

By ALAN BARKLEY

The songs which Richard Rodgers and the late Oscar Hammerstein wrote together have their own vitality and charm and many of them have already become classics of their kind. But in the transformation from the record album to the stage something invariably falls short. The songs never appear to be extensions of the plot situation but isolated instances surrounded by frail and often hopelessly uninspired, non-musical moments.

In THE SOUND OF MUSIC, playing till Nov. 23 at the O'Keefe Centre, Rogers & Hammerstein were assisted by Leland Hayward and Richard Halliday. It wasn't much of a boon.

Not that the story isn't perfect material. The caprices of Maria, the impetuous but impious novice who becomes first governess then wife and mother to Captain Von Trapp and his seven musical children, would appear to be an excellent plot line for a musical comedy and at times a few scenes were highly successful because of it.

But neither these moments, nor the enthusiastic opening numbers could rescue the rest of the faltering script. At times, though it was difficult to know to whom highest ineptitude should be awarded — the script or this production. Admittedly, because of the basic unreality of any musical production, there is a degree of stylization which both the director and the actors must employ. But many times the contrived and stilted manipulations of the players passed all credulity and disintegrated to hilarious melodrama.

The closing scene, for example, deals with the factual account of the Trapp family's escape from the Nazis into the hills; but what with an offstage light illuminating nine hopeful but resolute faces and a liturgical backing of "Climb Every Mountain", we were given the ending to a Hollywood-type religious epic.

The only things which were actually competent throughout were the set changes, although the sets themselves didn't seem to come up to the usual Centre standards.

Even the lyrical voice of Barbara Meister (Maria) became overarticulated and breathy during the dialogue, and co-star John Myers (Captain George Von Trapp) gave an unduly stiff performance. Some of the minor characters, however, provided a few good scenes, particularly Jack Collins' portrayal of Von Trapp's opportunist friend, and Reid Klein's very dramatic and intense characterization of the young Rolf Gruber towards the end of the play.

The musical numbers of course were excellent, and the wit and perception of Hammerstein's lyrics in the satiric song, "How Can Love Survive?" were brilliant. And if one could have shut his eyes while the production numbers were being played and ignored the bits between the songs, it would have been a thoroughly enjoyable evening. Like listening to the record album at home.

The Sunday night hoots gave amateurs (non-union members) an opportunity to meet an audience plus the bonus-factor of meeting and learning from the professionals. Now-established performers such as Judy Orban, Al Cromwell, the Pioneers and the Spokenmen polished their acts in that room at the top of St. Nicholas Lane.

In a meanwhile-stop-gap-measure, the Embassy has been featuring some of the best local performers such as David Campbell and the Pioneers. It is gratifying to see that the Sunday night audience is still faithful.

Gratifying, that is, to all but those who made the complaint.

MUSIC

By DAVID S. BUNDLER

"True art is imperishable and the true artist feels heartfelt pleasure in grand works of genius, and that is what enchants me when I hear a new composition of yours; in fact I take greater interest in it than in one of my own; in short I love and honour you... you for ever remain of all my contemporaries that one whom I esteem the most."

Beethoven (1823)

Who was this musical giant so esteemed by the aging Beethoven? Unfortunately, Luigi Cherubini is now little more than a name in musical history and usually appears only as a reactionary villain when the life of Berlioz is discussed.

Cherubini was a Florentine by birth who journeyed to Paris in his twenty-fifth year, never again to return to Italy. It was his good fortune to be attracted to opera at a time when Paris boasted of twenty-five theatres, but he was lucky to escape with his life during the turbulent years of the Revolution and Napoleon.

He was an avowed aristocrat but the hasty composition of Republican hymns ensured his safety. Napoleon, however, became a greater problem for Cherubini since the great soldier took an immediate dislike to his music. ("too much noise in the orchestra.") In fact, Paisiello was called to Paris by Napoleon for an important post when Cherubini was the logical choice.

The disappointed Florentine withdrew for a time, as he was often to do again, to pursue his interest in botany and drawing. In 1806, such a retreat from the world was to produce the Mass in F, and introduce a long period of ecclesiastical works. But when Cherubini met Napoleon in Vienna in 1805, the rift was apparently healed for the composer was entrusted with a dozen musical soirees. Later in 1810, he wrote an ode for the Emperor's second marriage. In 1816, Cherubini was appointed co-director of King's Chapel and six years later became director of the Conservatoire, a post he retained till his death in 1842.

At least in part, Cherubini's present obscurity is due to the vicious pen of Berlioz, whose accounts of his dealings with the director of the Conservatoire border on the libellous. It seems clear that Cherubini was strict and unbending in his administration, but then, directors of music schools are seldom hired to be renegades (the imagination boggles at the thought of Berlioz in such a position).

As evidenced by his music too, Cherubini was decidedly lacking in humour and explosive passion. He was trained in the classical tradition and adhered to its discipline throughout his life and work. Not unnaturally one of his last works was a Treatise on Counterpoint and Fugue (the theoretical interest of Berlioz on the other hand produced a groundbreaking tome on Orchestration).

Anecdotes abound about these two composers and their differences, but one of the most amusing illustrates the central issue between them: discipline vs. individuality. It seems that Cherubini had issued an order that male and female students of the Conservatoire must be protected from each other. To this end, the men would use one entrance and the women another. Not being a student as yet and therefore unfamiliar with such rules, Berlioz entered as he pleased and was shortly accosted by a hired flunkey. Dismissing this gentleman with the bite of his wit, Berlioz proceeded to the library. Soon Cherubini appeared (stuttering and stammering as Berlioz reproduces it) and attempted to put down the impudent invader. Before long the library was a shambles and Berlioz beat a hasty retreat.

But there is good reason for drawing attention to the other side of the coin: Berlioz was obviously a genius in certain respects, but his music all too often reflects the disorder of the man's life and thought. If he had taken the trouble he might have seen that Cherubini, besides being a blustering old fool, was also a composer of no mean gifts. The contrapuntal accomplishment revealed in the Scherzo of the Fourth Quartet or the Quam olim Abraham fugue in the C minor Requiem are worthy of study, as are the harmonic subtleties of the D minor Requiem or Medea.

Cherubini's melodic inspiration is frequently negligible but he can often carry the day with sheer professionalism. His orchestration seems to ignore Beethoven and Mozart in favour of Gluck, at least in his operas, but in his religious music there is often a darkness and mysticism found only in the Mozart Requiem before him. Like Mozart, he found little to admire in the flute ("the only thing worse than one flute is two") and as we have noted, he was loth to express anything akin to exultation, or even, romantic melancholy: the prevailing spirit is just gloomy and serious.

It is improbable that Cherubini will ever enjoy a revival—Medea was an exception recently, being used a vehicle for a peculiarly gifted diva since the style of opera which brought him fame is all but forgotten (who recalls the works of his illustrious contemporaries Gretry, Spontini, Hummel, Mehul or Lesueur?) And this church music is too limited in its range to gain widespread popularity.

Interprets Britten perfectly

By PAUL ENNIS

'The term 'musical feeling' is vague and ambiguous: it may have completely different meanings to different persons. If we replace it with 'emotional reactions', we know more precisely what is meant: musical structures impress us, we receive them, either submitting our minds to the ethical power of music, or transforming the impression into moral strength; but besides that, we are touched emotionally.' — Paul Hindemith.

In describing the merit, the virtue, the overriding impact of Sunday's Hart House Orchestra concert, the price of words goes up. The orchestra played with such balance, such feeling, such nuance, such unity, that it is very difficult to imagine a better interpretative performance of this music anywhere.

The program consisted of Benjamin Britten's complete writing for string orchestra and his Les Illuminations for soprano and strings. The latter work is a fascinating setting of Rimbaud's poem. Technical errors such as the intonation problems of the violin in the very high range (as in the solo closing the third section) and the occasional intonation problems of the soprano can largely be ignored.

For when the cumulative effect strikes you somehow as really soulful, as a genuine embodiment of the composer's musical intentions, when it conveys a searching, strange, mystical element with which you are able to relate, your judgement of the performance presupposes its intrinsic value. Soprano Mary Simmons and the orchestra gave the music a worth and immediacy that is lacking in too many performances.

Boyd Neel had the orchestra playing with rare musicianship throughout the concert. Their intensity, their wonderful dynamic range, their phrasing, were really exciting. Britten's music had tension, humour, burlesque, special effects, drive, technique, (though it occasionally lapsed into the incidental). It requires a very detailed reading to ensure its success. This was everywhere in evidence.

The Playful Pizzicato of the Simple Symphony had the finished playing it needs. The Rossini parody in the Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge received the necessary subtle dynamic changes, and the buffoonery implied in the quasi chitarra of the accompaniment was realized. The Wiener Walzer, the gross parody of the Viennese Waltz, was almost grotesquely hyperbolic; the rising and falling tremelo figures of the Moto Perpetuo from the same set of variations were brilliant.

A very real sense of immediacy existed due to the intimate association of Dr. Neel to Britten's work. Also, the works played spanned nearly twenty years of the composer's life, and any changes in composition style could be observed. No doubt the fact that Britten is still living and even more respected today, caused excitement in the concert. In the end however, it was the performance. It will be well remembered.

CBC attempts to analyze the freedom of the press

By EMILY MANDY

How free is the "Free Press?" This question, along with others equally controversial, was the principal topic of discussion on The Sixties last Sunday night.

One in a series of public affairs programs presented jointly by the Canadian Association for Adult Education and the CBC, Managing the News was an attempt at objective analysis.

Insofar as diversity of opinion is concerned, the program was a success. With Frank McGee as host and moderator, various individuals (James Hagerty, Douglas Fisher, MP, Richard O'Hagen, Donald Gordon and others) were interviewed; and incidents highlighting government-press relations were recalled and re-examined.

After the naval blockade against Cuba, for example, President Kennedy was accused of misleading the public by forestalling the free flow of information during the crisis. This form of news management was justified, however, "in the interests of national security." Indeed, in the guerrilla war that ordinarily exists between the press and the government, according to Mr. Hagerty: "The press usually wins."

Mr. Fisher made the point that the former prime minister of Canada held private briefings for selected reporters — actually "old cronies" — in the political press gallery, and that Prime Minister Pearson seemed to be doing the same thing. But Liberal press-relations-man O'Hagen countered with the fact that Mr. Pearson's conference was the first of an intended series, and was by no means secret.

Despite the interest aroused by these arguments, the program suffered from a shortage of time in which to discuss the issues thoroughly. There was also a noticeable lack of overall coherence: persons and places were intermixed, apparently at random. Otherwise, Managing the News was entertaining and thought-provoking.

Hollywood attempts the French style

By PAUL ENNIS

In The French Style is a Hollywood-produced foreign film. In spite of or because of this, it is neither technically complex nor intellectually stimulating. Its only message is typically Hollywood—the mid-west American girl who tries to make the Paris scene but returns home convinced of her exile's futility. Despite occasional padding of scenes with time consuming irrelevant action, and a script which is too often cliché-ridden the movie's fine acting and unobtrusive humour do stand out.

The film involves two periods in the life of aspiring artist Christina James (Jean Seberg). In the first, A Year To Learn The Language, she is successfully connoyed by a Parisian highschoolboy (Phillippe Forquet) whose credo admits no wine (he drinks coke) and no kissing in public. He says he is twenty-one but only a mid-western girl would believe it.

The episode generally, is highly believable, except when Guy tells her she is too tough for Paris. The climactic scene is the inextinguishable cold hotel room. "Tonight's the night" they finally agree. Or do they? In an almost flawless display of apprehension, humour and confession, Chris learns the language of Paris.

By the second episode, In The French Style, four years and a score of sexual adventures have passed. Chris is leading a very superficial artist's existence. Walter Beddoes (Stanley Baker) her current attaché is in Tripoli interviewing some 'Very Important Arabs', when her all-but-forgotten father (Addison Powell) flies in for a visit. In an admonition epitomizing the supreme height of vapidty, he warns her that her friends are only after her gaiety and beauty. With this epistle of Horace Greeley magnitude based in her subconscious, she becomes engaged to a San Francisco medicine man three months later.

The credibility of the first incident is due mainly to the very sensitive and steady acting of Phillippe Forquet. His ingenious approach is right for his role in the defensively-orientated affair. Jean Seberg manages to balance enough of a lack of sophistication with an artistic zeal for success to make this episode far more satisfying than the other.

In the latter, Stanley Baker overcomes some anemic dialogue to create much audience sympathy for his characterization of the hard, regimented correspondent. Jean Seberg's transformation from pseudo-playgirl to quasi-American Feminine Ideal is far too sudden and unexpected. Addison Powell, shackled by an anathema of a role, is totally insipid.

Secrets of ages long past may be revealed by these remains being studied by Dr. Gordon Edmond of the Royal Ontario Museum.

Mastodon found

By ALEXANDER ERVIN

Much of the skeletal remains of a mastodon have been recently uncovered near Wellandport, Ontario. The excavations have been carried out by the Etobicoke Historical Society, over the last two weeks. The bone and tusk fragments are presently in the hands of Dr. Edmond, associate curator of Vertebrate Paleontology at the Royal Ontario Museum.

The discovery is only one of several hundred made in South-Western Ontario since pioneer days. Canadian mastodon remains are most strongly concentrated in this same region.

Mammot americanus, wide spread in North America, was exceedingly elephant-like in characteristics. It was gross, approaching elephant size, having long, heavy limbs and a huge skull. It had a trunk and two tusks (evolved from incisors). Massive molar teeth were characteristic, having a multiplicity of cusps. The mastodon was found in cool, moist climates suitable for herbivore browsing.

Rapid climatic changes around 6000 B.P. (Before Present) brought about the extinction of the mastodon. Pollen analysis, done at the Wallaceburg site, dug several years ago, indicates this change. The lower strata, containing the skeletal material, shows much spruce and little white pine, characteristic of cool moist conditions; whereas the upper strata show little white pine and much spruce, indicating a warmer climate.

The Wellandport mastodon is tentatively dated 10,000-6,000 B.P. Unfortunately most of the bones were not 'in situ' at the time of excavation, because the area had been bull-dozed. Although exact knowledge of the bone articulation is not known, some interpretation of the cause and position of death can be made. The animal was trapped in a bog, on its back with the limbs presumably extending upward.

At the time of excavation the upper skull fragments were embedded in the blackish clay while the mandible and most of the teeth were on the surface, as a result of bull-dozing.

To date, the remains include most of the skull fragments, the mandible, most of the teeth, both tusks, a piece of problematical scapula, some foot bones, an atlas vertebra and a cervicle vertebra. The rest of the vertebrae are missing as are the hip bones. Sexing of the individual is impossible, since the pelvic bones are missing. A vexing problem, is the lack of limb bones. It is postulated, that they were extended above the bog, exposing them to weathering and carion. But it is wondered why the toe bones would survive and not the limbs?

The animal is thought to be young, but approaching mature size. Its shoulder height is estimated as being eight feet. A length cannot be deduced because of the paucity of vertebrae. The tusks are relatively short, approximately a yard in length.

Dr. Edmond hopes to reconstruct the specimen, placing it in one of the Museum galleries. He is presently waiting for more pieces which may be gathered this weekend.

It is possible that mastodons were hunted by early man in Ontario, although no direct evidence substantiates this theory. There are no signs of human tampering on the Wellandport skeleton; nor is there any case of mastodon kill site in Canada. However the time range, associated with the Ontario Paleo-Indian cultural traditions is contemporaneous with mastodon distribution.

On the western plains, Paleo-Indian was known to hunt the mammoth, larger relative of the mastodon. In this region, Clovis, fluted projectile points, hafted to spears were used. Such points were excellently suited for thrusting into the thick hides of the mammoth or the mastodon. A similar tradition of these points is found in the Upper Great Lakes region, but not directly associated with mastodon remains. Distribution maps have been made in Michigan showing the location of Clovis points, by county and of mastodon remains. Strong, though, not direct correlations can be deduced from these maps.

Unfortunately in the case of Ontario, not many Paleo-Indian sites have been dug and there is little in the way of point traditions in the region of mastodon concentration that might suggest similar correlations. However, the day may come when such distribution maps and their subsequent correlations might be useful in Ontario.

Paleo-Indian had to make his living by hunting. Certainly, if the mastodon was available, as it undoubtedly was, it must have been hunted. But the difficulty in downing such a large animal probably directed the emphasis on such woodland animals as deer, elk, caribou and beaver. Perhaps, someday a mastodon will be found, with a projectile point embedded in it.

SCIENCE

By DERRICK BREACH

Mr. Derrick Breach is a member of the department of mathematics where he is a lecturer in applied mathematics.

What is it that makes a mathematician choose to devote his life to making squiggles on scraps of paper? Part of the answer is very simple; the pleasure of solving problems and the even greater satisfaction of proving the correctness of the solution.

The great English mathematician G. H. Hardy once said to Bertrand Russell that if he could find a proof that the philosopher would die in five minutes he would of course be sorry to lose him but his sorrow would be far outweighed by the pleasure of providing the proof.

If one starts looking for other features common to mathematicians and distinguishing them from other people then these characteristics are hard to find. Mathematicians all have a streak of curiosity and are forever asking themselves and each other "Why" and "What if" but this hardly sets them apart from the rest of the human race. I regret to say that the one common feature that I have been able to observe is an apparent prowess with figures.

This is always puzzling to an outsider. Present a mathematician with a piece of arithmetic and ask for an answer on the spot. He will probably be wrong. But given time, he will check his estimate of the answer. This is his normal method of working.

The mathematician uses his overall knowledge to guess the answer. This is strategy. He then uses his ingenuity to fill in the details. Tactics. Finally he presents the whole problem and its solution in a logical form.

The outposts of the field of modern mathematics are constantly surrendering to such manoeuvres. Old results do not surrender themselves easily but must be battled for every inch of the way. Indeed some famous problems have withstood siege for many years. It is not a waste of time to attack such problems for it usually happens that the weapons developed are just as interesting as the solution to the problem itself.

A research mathematician is a creative worker. Although ninety-nine per cent of his work is routine analysis (that is, drudgery) the remaining portion depends ultimately on inspiration and intuition, two qualities which can be developed if present at all, but which if entirely absent can never be injected. High examination marks do not necessarily imply great of geometry because he knew originality.

These moments of inspiration do not come unless a way has been prepared for them. This is done by the examination of known results; the conjecture of new results, and the examination of the consequences of the conjecture. In this, one is often aided by analogy. Indeed the ability to recognize the similarity in structure of two apparently unrelated results is an essential requirement of the mathematician's mentality. This recognition of form perhaps explains why so many mathematicians enjoy music.

Of course in reasoning by analogy one must be prepared for the errors arising from a false analogy and sometimes the final and correct result is quite unexpected. The mathematician derives great pleasure from these unexpected results in much the same way as a musician derives pleasure from a discord when harmony was anticipated.

Let us suppose that the mathematician has succeeded in producing a new result. He then has the problem of communicating it. Even the ideas of a genius are useless — he can explain them to someone else.

It sometimes happens that a mathematician spends so long working in a highly specialized field and becomes so facile in the dialect of his own symbolism that he forgets that he is the only one proficient in that dialect.

Newton when he published his Principia stated and proved his results in the language of geometry because he knew that in this form it would be more understandable. He had originally discovered his results by using calculus, a new dialect which he helped to create, but this was comprehensible to only a few people whereas geometry was understood by a much larger group.

This problem of efficient communication has become acute in modern mathematics because the rate of publication has accelerated enormously in the past fifty years. A recent issue of Mathematical Reviews, a monthly publication, lists 1200 items. If 200 of these are second editions, bibliographies, histories, etc. this leaves a world production of 1000 papers and books per month in various languages. Faced with such an output the modern mathematician must become highly specialized to get anywhere in the time available.

This specialization inevitably leads to duplication of effort with workers quite unaware that their current problem is being attacked under a different guise by other workers in a different specialized field. How to make efficient and effective combinations of the powerful forces of various specialized fields is one of the problems of mathematics today. In time it may lead to the evolution of a new type of specialist, the mathematical organization man. Horror!

Sincere thanks for a stimulating, and generally thoughtful series of Remembrance Day meditations. Too often, Nov. 11 becomes a day of hypocrisy; too seldom is it a day of self-examination. We have seen it practised again this year — this fallacy that unctuous words and poppy wreaths can resurrect the dead and save the national conscience. Again the politicians have disheveled the fallen with their sabre-rattling. And again many of the clergy have betrayed their Lord by echoing "Amen."

There has been much self-congratulations and little remembrance, for pomp is a better drawing-card than peace. The Varsity has performed a signal service by its honest analysis.

However, an analysis, no matter how good is a negative thing unless accompanied by progressive action. The one unfortunate aspect of the front-page editorial "No Honor Today" was its tendency to be bitter and vindictive, rather than purposeful. No one can deny honestly the premise that war is evil; but many will reject pacifist ideals if they are expressed only in negative attacks. A sincerely committed and active peace front program as a practical alternative to violence and the nuclear deterrent theory, would attract wide support. The re-opening of old wounds can only harden and alienate conservative minds. For this reason, I feel the most important point in the Remembrance Day articles was not the criticism of our macabre celebration of death. Rather, it was the editorial suggestion, repeated by both Ian Gentles and Doug Ward, that the study of peace (and perhaps, some day, pacifism) be seriously undertaken in this university. Only through intimate knowledge can we attain the faith required to live up to the high ideals implicit in "No Honor Today." I hope that the Varsity editors and the SAC president will take up their own challenge and lead the way to the establishment of peace as more than platitudes on this campus. I for one, will be glad to support their cause.

Your editorial in the Nov. 11th issue admits the necessity of stopping Hitler. It completely fails to consider even for a moment, however, what Hitler stood for or what stopping him involved. Had it done so, it could not have said what it did.

I hold no brief for the firestorming of German cities or the dropping of atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki; but if you had considered the meaning of Hitler and what was involved in stopping him you could not have equated even these actions — committed in the heat of war and, moreover, seeming at least then to some, however erroneously, as capable of shortening the war — with Hitler's mass murder, persisted in even when conflicting with military necessities. Do you realize that in the later part of the war, many train-loads of victims were sent to the murder camps, using trains badly needed for military purposes?

How in your view was Hitlerism to be stopped, which as has long been known, would have extended its system of mass murder on a world-wide basis in the event of victory? Was Hitlerism to be stopped by words of peace, love and sweet reasonableness? The fundamental moral failure of the West in those days did not consist in finally recognizing the moral necessity of stopping Hitler, but in not doing so much earlier when this goal could have been accomplished at much less cost. It would be inane and indeed a sign of the gravest moral irresponsibility to say that because Hitler had not been stopped in 1933 or 1936, it was wrong to try and stop him in 1939, by the means then alone possible.

Yours truly,
Emil L. Fackenheim,
Dept. of Philosophy.

I find it utterly amazing that an editor of a newspaper such as the Varsity could be so blind as to believe what he had printed on the front page Monday.

I must acknowledge your sympathy for the families of the dead; I must agree that the death of 30,000,000 men is indeed tragic. But in commemorating this day, we do not, as you suggest, call "glorious" the grief borne by numerous families; nor do we call "glorious" 30,000,000 deaths.

What is glorious is the gift of these people to us; the freedoms which gave you the right to print your editorial. And regardless of what I think of it, I have the utmost respect for your right to say it. The gift of free life that we now have is what is glorious in the atrocities of war. This, Sir, is why 500 men are honored today at the Soldiers' Tower; this is why the death of 30,000,000 people is not senseless. Yes, there is indeed honor today.

It grieves me to think that former students of this University laid down their lives that you might be permitted the freedom to print the slander that appeared in The Varsity on November 11th. You have grossly abused your privilege as an editor and brought shame not only to yourself but to the whole University. I cannot believe that your opinions represent those of any great number of students on this campus — if they do, then student opinion has reached a point of degeneracy heretofore unknown.

You say that "In stopping the Nazis, the Allies perpetrated atrocities on a par with those of their opponents." This is simply not true. Have you forgotten Belsen, Dachau and Buchenwald? Have you forgotten how Canadian soldiers were treated after the surrender of Hong Kong? If you have, or perhaps you never heard, then ask some of the survivors of enemy brutality. Your lapse of memory is even more incredible since your editorial must have been written on the eve of Kristallnacht. There are many in this city who can tell you of the horror of that night.

The whole tone and pattern of your article is all too familiar to those who have eyes to see through the facade of propaganda. As a member of the teaching staff I realize that in the exuberance of youth undergraduates are naturally iconoclastic and idealistic. It has ever been so and we accept this as a part of growing into maturity. But your editorial has overstepped the bounds of youthful idealism. It was, in fact, a brutal insult to those whose voices can no longer be raised in protest and as such, is a cowardly thing. For this reason I cannot remain silent at this time. I do not know what your motives were in writing your editorial. If they were genuine, then I am sorry that you have not seen through those who are exploiting you on the campus. If your motives are not genuine, then I think it is despicable that you should seek publicity by heaping abuse on those who died. Fortunately, you cannot besmirch their names. They are quite beyond the range of your pen and materialistic philosophy. "Their bodies are buried in peace; but their name liveth forevermore."

The simple yet dignified service which was conducted by our President yesterday was a fitting tribute to their memory and the attendance at the service should, I think, convince you that your opinions are quite out of line with the great majority of your fellow students.

Robert E. Osborne, Emmanuel College.

May I commend you on your timely, and certainly courageous editorial, "No Honour Today", published in Monday's Varsity.

Although I personally agree with most of the thoughts expressed in the editorial, I view its merits on the basis of the heated discussions it has produced in our faculty.

While many engineers disagree with this point of view, the editorial brought to mind the Remembrance Day with far stronger impact than any memorial service.

Ever since high school I have been disgusted with the spirit of the platitudinous ceremonies honouring the dead. I cannot feel otherwise, having been born during the war in a European city which was bombed by Germans, English, Americans, and Russians.

Although certain statements in the editorial may be misrepresented, it certainly made many people assess exactly what they are remembering on Remembrance Day. And even though many of us (myself included) would probably fight for Canada in case of war, we must know why we are fighting.

Thank you again for a worthwhile editorial.

Your truly,
Michael Kisly (IV APSC)

remember

In reply to your editorial of Nov. 11, I would like to express my agreement with your statements. It is refreshing to see someone dare to speak in such a fashion and stick their neck out.

The opinion of 75 per cent of the people with whom I talked also agree with you. The other 25 per cent misinterpreted your criticism. They understood that it was directed toward the men that died. However they failed to realize that it was the fact that these men were powerless victims of a political system which wrongly informed and persuaded them to kill that was being criticized in your article.

The appalling thing that bothered me about the attitude of some of these people with whom I talked was the fact that they unquestionably accept the present political and economic situation and think it unpatriotic to criticize any of the established institutions. To do so, makes one automatically an outcast and rebel.

If people refuse to voice their true opinions and to criticize things that they think need improvement, then what is the purpose of freedom of speech? Its vital function is being abused by a fear of ridicule and a strict sense of conformity. If this is to be a true democracy, there must be constructive criticism for future improvement.

We have to pave the way for the next generation and not allow the complex mesh of political systems to play havoc with the majority as they have done in the last two wars. We are the ones to see to it that there is a diminishing of the attitude of using men as tools and an increasing of the value and importance of each individual. Only when this ideal have been brought into practice can the mass of people stop being puppets manipulated by the nimble fingers of clever politicians.

NICKEL IN WORLD MARKETS

How Canadian Nickel is helping to bring Paris closer to Rome

The world's longest vehicular tunnel is one of the greatest engineering feats in Western Europe. When completed, it will shorten the road distance between Paris and Rome by 125 miles. And Canadian nickel is playing its role in this great project. Alloy steels containing nickel are providing strength to the massive bits and extension rods for the semi-automatic drills. Dependable nickel-containing steels were selected for the axles, wheels and bearings of the mining cars used to haul away rock; and, because of its ability to withstand very severe working conditions, nickel-chromium steel was used extensively in the mammoth 'Jumbo' mobile drilling rig. The growth of nickel markets at home and abroad helps strengthen Canada's economy and provide jobs for Canadians.

Claims Bible

is nothing but fairy tale

"The story of Christ is nothing but a beautiful fairy tale," said Dr. William Swinton, director of the Royal Ontario Museum, during a lecture on Science and Christianity Wednesday.

Dr. Swinton, a brilliantly fluent speaker, despite his provocative arguments held the absolute attention of his audience for more than 90 minutes.

He asked for a thorough re-examination of Christianity in the light of contemporary scientific knowledge.

"Man today," he began, "possesses an amount of knowledge and a capability that is frightening."

He explained that because of the invention of the electron microscope the source of life itself is on the threshold of discovery. He added that radar has made it possible for man to examine the universe to an unprecedented extent.

"The tragedy", he added, is that we can predict the end of the earth, when we will have solved every problem known to mankind, but all this will pass into oblivion unless we relay to other planets in the universe the civilization we have developed."

To this end, he said, listening posts have been established to record and decipher "music" which emanates from outer space, which some scientists already take as proof of life on other planets.

Dr. Swinton then examined the life of Christ. He said that since Homo Sapiens had existed for 40,000 years, it was hard to believe that man had gone "unforgotten" for 38,000 years before his birth. "Where does it state that Christ was born on Dec. 25? Or that he died at Easter?" he asked. "The fact is that it was not until the fourth century that Christians adopted feast days, and these they copied from ancient Mithraism."

He added that since it can be scientifically proved that such concrete events as the birth and death of Christ did not occur when it is said they did, what grounds are there for believing in supernatural events like the Virgin Birth or the Resurrection?

"I think Christ was a failure in life, just as most of us are, and that the resurrection and the Virgin Birth were mere inventions to glorify the life of an exceptional human being."

He concluded: "The Church today is a social institution. In Toronto you pick your church as carefully as you pick your golf club."

Dr. Swinton's words proved too much for one member of the audience, an unidentified, balding, middle-aged man who, muttering, staged a noisy and melodramatic walk-out.

Shrugged the professor: "You see, that is the kind of person I'm up against all the time."

Mulock playoffs start Monday as football season ends

By AL SCHOENBORN
Interfac Editor

The Mulock Cup playoffs are upon us once again. A regular season that was full of surprises ended with two interfaculty football games Wednesday.

In Division I, Dentistry spoiled Victoria College's bid for a perfect season by holding the Scarlet and Gold to a scoreless tie. And Pharmacy won the Division II title with a perfect 5-0 record following a narrow 8-0 win over University College Redmen.

The druggists' points came on a touchdown by Bob Stickley and two points by Keith Flexman.

St. Mike's and Dentistry finished second and third respectively in the first division to qualify for the quarter-finals. In Division II, Medicine took second place after being awarded a win over Forestry, which was unable to field a team because of injuries. Trinity edged out UC for third and last playoff spot.

Playoffs begin Monday

Mulock Cup playoffs get under way Monday with two quarter-final games. Meds faces Dentistry at 12 noon to decide who will advance to the semi-finals against Vic.

At 2 p.m., St. Mike's and Trinity square off, the winner to meet Pharmacy in the semi-final. Vic and Pharmacy have byes into the semi-finals.

As usual, Victoria will be favored to retain the Mulock Cup, while St. Mike's should again be the top threats to take it away from Vic.

AS THE "GOLDEN TOE" MUFFS THE BIG ONE

Ruggerites stay undefeated, tie 8-8

A UTREC
Syndicated Service

Five years ago Varsity Rugger Blues ended 10 lonely years in the OQAA rugger wilderness by wresting the Turner Cup from McGill. Since then Blues have consolidated their place in the sun, and have gradually transformed a good intercollegiate fifteen into a first class powerhouse by anybody's standards.

Blues made this painfully evident Wednesday night at Varsity Stadium, when they came from behind to tie the Senior Ontario Rugger Union All-Stars 8-8, and wind up the season undefeated.

In the dying seconds of the match, Ian Sinclair took a John McNeil pass and raced 30 yards for the tying score. Although Paul Wilson's convert attempt was short, Blues had once again asserted they are one of the best sides in the province.

Once again Blues played only one half well—the second. Behind 8-0 at the intermission, they only caught fire with their backs against the wall.

Rich Hayman counted the first home try from a set scrum, after Larry Johnson had lugged the ball down to the All-Stars' five-yard line. Wilson converted, having a much more favorable angle than for Sinclair's try.

The All-Stars also tallied their points on two tries and a convert.

It was a hard contest for Blues' forwards, but the pack rose to the occasion and fought as well as their more experienced opposition. Gerth Hughes, Johnson, and McNeil shone in the loose play, while hooker Bill Stow

vsp czamecki

Outside the scrum, Blues defences were pressed for the first time this fall. In the first half, poor positioning and missed tackles led to long gains by the All-Stars.

In the Scrum: Fly-half Hayman required several stitches for a head cut. . . . Some Blues will be playing in a Toronto side against a combined Barbarian Wanderer fifteen Saturday on the back campus.

Hockey Blues shorthanded for tilt with Waterloo Lutheran tonight

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues will be shorthanded for their exhibition game against Waterloo Lutheran tonight at the Arena. The game will mark the first official appearance of the season for the pucksters, but fans will have to wait until later in the season to get a glimpse of the complete team.

Blues will be reduced to seven or eight forwards due to a rash of injuries and some personal commitments. Hank Monteith, Blues' promising rookie centre, and all-star Stuart McNeil will be unable to play for personal reasons. Ward Passi, Steve Monteith and Butch McGee are still recovering from injuries.

As a result of these shortages, coach Joe Kane will have to shuffle his players to fill the gaps. Bob Hamilton and Ian Sinclair are slated for full-time duty on the defence. But their usual partners, Bob Awrey and Pete Speyer, may be pressed into duty as forwards, where they are equally adept.

Kane hasn't decided on his forward combinations for the game because his usual units

PETE SPEYER

Hockey Blues' holdovers

have been broken up by the absences. Kane intends to experiment with various units tonight.

Kane is not worried over the present dilemma, mostly because he expects his truant charges back in the fold shortly. Blues still have at least three more exhibition games to decide on the line combinations they will employ in the regular season.

NOTES: McGill Redmen are said to have one of their strongest teams in years. Veterans Larry Jones, Steve Molson, Mike Richards and goaltender John Tennant have graduated but Redmen have added several bright prospects.

One newcomer is Ken Walters, formerly with Hull-Ottawa Canadiens of the Eastern Pro League who had been working out with the Canadian Olympic team as University of British Columbia. Defenceman Bernard Roy, an all-star at Laval last season, is also working with Redmen but his eligibility is still up in the air.

Another new prospect is forward Johnny Taylor, who played with Montreal Junior Canadiens.

Admission is free for tonight's game.

OUR VETERANS ARE BEING THREATENED

A news item that went practically unnoticed last week was a meeting of the governors of the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union held here in Toronto. The main topic on the agenda was the admittance of four colleges from the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association to the CIAU.

With the acceptance of Laurentian University of Sudbury, Waterloo Lutheran University, Osgoode Hall and York University, the CIAU now includes members from all five Canadian intercollegiate athletic associations. At present, there are 45 members in the three-year-old national organization.

This is another step in the CIAU program of focussing more attention on Canadian college sports at the national level. Last season, national hockey and basketball championships were held for the first time, and on Nov. 23, the first national intercollegiate harrier championship will be staged at Guelph. Within two years, the CIAU hopes to sponsor two national football bowl games as inter-conference championships.

Another item discussed at the meeting, which will perhaps have more far-reaching consequences than the former, was a plan to hold a national meeting of university athletic directors to discuss common problems. One aim of this group is reported to be the enforcement of a four or five-year eligibility rule across the country.

This topic has been discussed at great length unofficially by athletic directors, coaches and players across Canada for some time. Opinion is generally divided on the value of such a rule. Within our Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association, for example, Varsity football coach Dalt White has often expressed his favor for such a rule and it is reported that John Metras of Western feels the same way. Queen's and McGill, on the other hand, are said to be against it.

The arguments voiced in favor of a limited eligibility rule generally follow the lines that a great disparity in talent results when some athletes have had up to six and seven years college experience while others are playing right out of high school. Entering into this argument is the factor of American college athletes who come to Canada after their three-year eligibility expires in the United States.

McGill, for example, has reaped tremendous benefits from football players trained in the U.S. who enter McGill for post-graduate work. Quarterback Tom Skyeck, a graduate of Cornell, provides the best example of the past few years.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH STAYING AT UNIVERSITY?

Skyeck could have qualified as a pro when he went to McGill in 1959 to study Dentistry. Since there was no rule restricting his eligibility, such as the three-year rule employed in the U.S., Skyeck played for McGill Redmen and was head-and-shoulders above any quarterback produced in Canadian high schools.

Coaches who have to send their players against "pro" talent such as Skyeck will argue that it's not fair for a Canadian high school graduate to be forced to compete against players of Skyeck's calibre. They'll also claim that a player who has competed for three or four years should step aside and give others a chance to play college sports.

These arguments merit consideration but there are more points in favor of unlimited eligibility that put me in opposition to any move towards limitation. Firstly, the main purpose for having intercollegiate sports is to provide an outlet for students who want to play at a highly-organized level. For this reason alone, students who qualify under other eligibility regulations should be allowed to play for their college teams without condition, whether they've been at the university for two years or 25 years.

Another aspect of the question is that veteran performers improve the quality of the league and are a boon to publicity and promotion, a field where college athletics in this country needs improvement. When an athlete has played in the college league for four or five years, his talents are quickly recognized by observers and the league doesn't become just a collection of non-entities.

Former Varsity basketball star Peter Potter and McGill veterans Leo Konyk and Willie Lambert can be cited as examples. They became popular attractions that drew fans to college sports over the years.

There is no logical reason to assume that one university has an advantage over another in being able to keep athletes around continually. All universities have post-graduate courses and it has become common for students to complete more than one course.

Also, it can't be assumed that athletes will remain at university year after year just to play sports. College students have more sense than that. And even if they do stick around just to play sports, who can argue that a university education is a waste of time?

The best rookie crop in many years

Swimmers are powerhouse once again

By SHEL KRAKOFKY

If pre-season indications are transformed into reality, Varsity Swim Blues should have their most successful season in history.

Blues have won the Intercollegiate title for six of the last seven years and set six Canadian records en route to winning the championship last year.

The rookie crop is one of the best, if not the best in years, and will bolster an already strong team. Mike Chapelle, a breastroker supreme, while at Downsview Collegiate last year, swam the 200-yard breaststroke faster than anyone in intercollegiate ranks.

Kal Schneider, an American from Union College in the United States, has broken 50 seconds in the 100-yard freestyle which is comparable to breaking 10 seconds for the 100-yard dash.

Also sporting good times is Toronto-bred Robin Campbell who also swims for the Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club. Campbell is a top-flight butterfly and individual medley man.

Other rookies who have looked good in practice are Jim Parker, Stan Walker, and Barry Milliken.

Blues have lost several top veterans from last year's championship squad. Former stars Marv Chapelle, who is Mike's older brother, and Walt Unger have graduated as has diver George Huovien, who dominated springboard acrobatics in the Intercollegiate loop for the past three years.

Also gone from last year's team are Harvey Armstrong, Bill Pigott, Alex Chiu, Larry Bell and John Ridpath. Ridpath will leave the swimming to the younger fellows and along with Larry Freeman will coach this year's squad. This will be Freeman's third year as a Varsity swimming coach.

Back from last year are Tom Verth and Pete Richardson who will serve as co-captains. Other returning swimmers are Graeme Barber, Jim Leitch, Don Wheeler, John Weekes and diver Bob Smagala.

BABY BUBBLES: Once Tom Verth gets over the bumps and bruises of intercollegiate football and in shape for the swimming season, Blues' swim team will be in a good position to break all existing Canadian freestyle relay records. . . At present, U of T holds every Canadian freestyle relay record . . .

Rumour has it that cheerleader Vance White will try to gain a birth on the team as a diver. The team will carry two divers but at present Bob Smagala is the only man on the springboard . . .

Varsity's first meet will be an intrasquad affair at Hart House Friday, Dec. 6. The first intercollegiate meet for Blues will be at Western, Dec. 14.

This is one of the many faces of Tom Verth, former All-American swimmer, high-flying end with the football Blues, and the prince of subtle humor. Verth is seen swimming at Hart House pool, not drinking.

March on Queen's Park grows

"Maybe Robarts will handle the situation well, but I want to be able to say that I've done something about it," Richard Pope (IV Trin) said last Friday.

Pope was speaking to about 35 students who gathered in the Varsity offices to hear plans for the march on Queen's Park.

Participants in the Friday march will present a brief to Premier John Robarts urging he act wisely in the coming Federal-Provincial Conference, which will assess the present situation of Confederation.

The students at Friday's meeting were representatives of various clubs, colleges, and organizations across campus. They will be working among their groups to stir up interest in and inform others about the march.

Doug Ward, President of the SAC, Jim Laxer (Varsity features editor) and Ken Drushka (Varsity editor) also addressed the meeting.

Pope explained the French-Canadian attitude towards English Canada — the fact that the French feel that the BNA Act must be replaced.

"They feel they're strong enough to exist as a separate state. They feel they're better off than all these Afro-Asian countries forming today."

"It could be very dangerous, he added, "if Robarts in his key position at the Federal-Provincial conference demanded everything the French are asking for."

Ward stressed that students must show Robarts they are concerned for the future of Confederation.

"We're not telling him what to do," he said. "We're merely showing our concern."

Laxer said this was an interesting test to see "just what we can do on this campus."

Drushka outlined the organization of the march. Placards and hand-bills are being prepared, and representatives in campus groups are lining up people to help lead the march, he said.

There will be a meeting Wednesday in room 2102 of Sidney Smith Hall for people who want more information.

Drushka added: "We don't want this to be a carnival. The press and Robarts would laugh at us. That would do more harm than good."

He went on to say that the group representatives would act as marshalls in the march and that there would be a band to lead it. This would lessen the chance of the march becoming a carnival.

Two students killed

Two University of Toronto students are dead and a third in hospital after a Sunday morning crash on Highway 401 near Whitby.

Dead are William Calvin McNeely, 23, (II PHE), of Williamsburg; and Brian Wright, 21, (II Dents), of Ottawa. In Oshawa hospital is the driver of the car, Peter Edmison, 20, (III Dents), also of Ottawa.

Both McNeely and Wright were living at the Delta Upsilon fraternity house at 182 St. George St. All three were members of the fraternity.

Provincial police said they thought the students were returning to Toronto from Peterboro when they struck an abutment of a highway underpass, 300 yards west of an OPP detachment.

Oshawa hospital spokesmen said Sunday Edmison was "in as good condition as could be expected." He suffered a broken pelvis and dislocated hip.

The fraternity said only that they would provide pallbearers for one funeral. The other will be a private service.

March for Canada

Background

An ad hoc committee of students working last week in connection with the Canadian/Canadian Committee of the SAC have prepared a brief for presentation to Premier John Robarts expressing the concern of the student body over the coming Federal-Provincial Conference.

All students have been urged to accompany the brief to Queen's Park from the flag pole behind the SAC building this Friday at 1 p.m. For news regarding the March for Canada read this box on Wednesday and Friday.

Wednesday 1 p. m.

Professor Paul Fox of the department of political economy will address the rally of the March for Canada Wed. Nov. 20 at 1 p.m. in room 2102 Sidney Smith Hall.

Doug Ward, President of the Students' Administrative Council, will speak at the meeting on the need for student action. NFCUS past president Stewart Goodings will chair the meeting.

The Lady Godiva Memorial Band and members of the Blue and White Band are working out musical arrangements for Friday's march to Queen's Park.

Information

Placards for the various colleges and faculties are being prepared in the Electrical Building this week. Don Monro, president of the Engineering Society, has stressed the need for volunteer workers on Wednesday and Thursday nights.

Volunteers are needed for a few hours work on posters, sound equipment and handbills. Anyone wishing to help or to seek information is asked to call 923-5921, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Exchange termed success

The faculty representative for the Harvard exchange, Professor Don Forster, termed the weekend the most successful of the three exchanges with Harvard to date.

From their arrival Thursday night, the Harvardites mixed constantly with their hosts, and the two groups split into smaller factions that made boredom or conversational lulls impossible.

This was the observation of Students' Administrative Council Vice-President Mary Pat McMahon (III SMC), in evaluating the success of the weekend.

The first of this year's exchange committee has stressed this aspect of communication in selecting students and programming weekends this year.

An example of the weekend's tone was seen in a seminar at the O'Keefe Company when the students listened to a talk between teaching fellow Raymond Tripp of University College and Alan Borovoy, secretary of the Toronto Labor Committee for Human Rights.

While accepting the full hospitality of the brewery, the weekenders heard Mr. Tripp call for a revival of the medieval attitudes of life and Mr. Borovoy suggest that a Negro didn't have to be liked, "just hired."

At the informal seminar, David Selter (III UC) introduced Mr. Tripp as "the gentleman at the far, far right of the table." Mr. Tripp has expressed rightist attitudes recently in The Varsity.

Throughout their stay in Toronto, the Harvard students displayed constant interest in the university. They attended Friday classes at the different colleges and met their home guests over coffee in the Trinity Buttery.

A staff member of the Harvard Crimson wanted to know all the mechanics of a Canadian college newspaper. Others were eager to put on a blue and white scarf to tour the campus and city.

A cocktail party in Hart House Warden McCulley's apartment presented the personal side of the university administration to the visitors. Seats at a performance of UC's Pickwick added to the wide view of U of T seen by the Harvardites.

A farewell tea at St. Joseph's College Sunday went a few hours over schedule: nobody wanted to leave.

Urges compartmentalizing

Visiting Harvard students and their Varsity hosts were told Friday that it is up to them to get their own education.

Dr. D. G. Ivey, principal of New College, told 40 exchange participants that general education should end in high school and be replaced in college with in-depth study of a limited area of human knowledge. Otherwise his knowledge will be only superficial, he said.

Dr. Ivey said "compartmentalizing" was only a means to facilitate study which will later help the student relate knowledge in a liberal education.

He said the role of colleges was to provide means for self-education. He felt the diversity within New College best displayed this ideal.

THE EDWARD KYLIE TRUST AWARD

Applications may be made to the Secretary of the Edward Kylie Trust on or before December 31, 1963, by candidates for the Edward Kylie Trust Award for the year 1964-65. These applications should be made in writing and should give particulars of the qualifications and record of the applicant with a view to the following requirements. The Award will be made to a male student who is a British subject, either a graduate or an under-graduate of Arts, preferably in the course of Modern History at the University of Toronto, to enable him to pursue his studies in Great Britain. The Trustees shall make their award to that candidate who appears from his record at the University to be most likely to occupy a position of leadership and influence in the Community. The sum available is Nine Hundred Dollars ($900.00) for the year 1964-65 and the Trustees may renew the award for a second year if they are satisfied with the first year's record. The trustees, upon receiving applications, will arrange for the examination of the candidates and if the trustees are not satisfied as to the suitability of any of the candidates they will have the right to withhold the award. Dated this 13th day of November, A.D. 1963.

CUP COMMENT

By BRUCE KIDD

Armchair quarterbacks on this campus contend the poor showing of the football Blues in recent years has driven away the crowds from Varsity Stadium. But it also could be argued that falling attendance and the increasing apathy towards intercollegiate athletics at U of T is cause—not effect—of Blues' dismal showings of late.

Everyone but the scorekeeper thought this fall's Varsity squad was but one player away from eventual league champion Queen's Golden Gaels, and good enough for second place at least. That was in September.

What inspired Gaels to produce so regularly this fall was the encouragement they received through the week on their own campus. There Saturday's game is the concern of the whole university community—students and faculty alike. By comparison, the Varsity Blue is an anonymous orphan.

Just another example of the campus-wide support given to Conner and Company in Kingston this fall was the issue of the Queen's Journal following the game in which Gaels clinched the Yates Cup. The Journal ran a gala 12-page edition—every copy inch devoted to the football team.

RIVERSIDE NOT WET ENOUGH

With the ever-increasing enrolment pressure on posthigh school institutions today, one might suppose a university would never suffer for a lack of students. Especially when the university is offering reasonable facilities and a good faculty. But such a problem now confronts Riverside University in southern California. Riverside presently has an enrolment of 2037 and has all but abandoned its goal of 10,000 students by 1970.

What's the catch? There just aren't enough bars, cabarets, coffee houses, and movie theatres to satisfy a student body. Riverside is a desert campus hemmed in by the San Bernardino mountains, and buses make only one trip per hour into the nearest town. So no one wants to study there.

But the unfortunate Riverside U is not the only university on this continent which could well use a campus pub. What about U of T?

SLIGHTLY MORE THAN PINK

"I deny ever saying Lester Pearson was a Communist, but he certainly is a socialist." Such a comment was made last week by Eldon Woolliams, Conservative MP for Bow River, Alberta in an attack on socialism delivered to the McGill Progressive Conservative Club.

Mr. Woolliams first realized Prime Minister Pearson was a socialist when he saw him publicly embrace "that decrepit socialist Hazen Argue." What's more, Mr. Woolliams continued, "birds of a feather flock together and birds of red feathers roost together."

"Socialism and communism are the same thing, in that they both have the same end," he said. One wonders then why the RCMP are wasting so much time investigating university small fry, when they could have a field day at 24 Sussex Drive.

WOLF ! WOLF !

Several weeks ago Engineers at the University of British Columbia demonstrated that no one on their campus could tell art from junk. They did so by smashing seven phony statues in front of a stunned crowd.

Last week at UBC, vandals smashed three statues and pushed another off its base. This time it was no joke. The statues were valued at $4,000.

COUP D'ETAT AT WESTERN

According to a speculative Western Gazette news story last week, the UWO Model Parliament's Conservative government was almost overthrown by a military junta during the recent session. The Gazette reported that the military at Western had been overly frustrated by the minority government's procrastination in giving them some nuclear weapons, and had almost delivered an ultimatum to the prime minister. The proposed ultimatum would have demanded the immediate surrender of the government and the "democratic abolition of elections."

With Richard Tan's Model Parliament reforms expected to plunge U of T's parliament into a series of shifting coalition governments, might one be forgiven for envisaging a putsch engineered by the Brute Force Committee next January?

STUDENT EDITOR FIRED

Another one of those sorry-to-see-you-go statements which is hard to believe came out of the University of Miami last week. The student publications board there dismissed the editor of its newspaper, The Hurricane, but denied charges the firing was the result of a controversial editorial which urged greater participation for Negroes in campus activities at U of M, particularly in the athletic department.

The ostensible reason for the sacking of editor Elayne Gilbert was a requirement that all students carry a full class load and that editor Gilbert fell below that standard. Miss Gilbert climbs two teachers dropped her from their courses without any warning "immediately after my editorial." Said Miami's Vice-President Franklin Williams: "It is not true Miss Gilbert was taken to task for the editorial. The university extends a great deal of freedom to its students."

Skule Nite open to arts

Tickets for Skule Nite 6T4, normally only available to Skulemen, are going on sale to the rest of the student body this year for the first time.

This annual engineering production is a variety show, made up partly of a series of short skits, satirical and humorous, interspersed with dance numbers and orchestral variations.

A special movie was produced in glorious black and white for the show. What it features is a closely-kept secret, either to pass the censors, or to keep the new comedy routines for a surprise.

Dr. Archibald von Heinrich-Schmidt will make a second appearance with a continuance of his well-known campus escapades.

The traditional kickline, reputed by its producer to be the loveliest line of legs on the campus, includes several members of the CNE Canadettes. Choreography is under the direction of Arline Patterson, who has been with Skule Nite for eight successive shows.

Peter Grant, well-known for his musical productions of previous years, does the music arrangements for the 15-piece band, which is backed up by a 20 voice chorus.

The Heritage Singers are returning for a second appearance in Skule Nite to perform a wide variety of folk tunes and songs.

The stage sets were designed by Pat Gangnon. Seven or eight different scene changes are planned for the show.

Skule Nite 6T4 is playing in Hart House Theatre Nov. 19-23. Tickets are now on sale at the Hart House Theatre box office at $1.50 for Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday nights.

Open CUS meet tonight

Is the Canadian Union of Students worth it?

Campus Canada, the magazine published by CUS, goes on sale today after several delays, with a feature article discussing the value of the organization. The question will be examined in detail at an open meeting tonight in the East Common Room, Hart House, at 7:30 p.m.

Speakers at the meeting will be Students' Administrative Council President Doug Ward (III Emm), Vice-President Mary Pat McMahon (III SMC) former NFCUS President Stu Goodings (S-GS), and Ontario Region Chairman Jack Tuttleby (III SMC).

Every student at the University of Toronto is a member of CUS, but few have any conception of what it does for them, where it is going, and what the recent changes in the structure of CUS mean in the light of the biculturalism controversy. The speakers at the meeting will discuss these and other questions, hoping to provide questions and discussion from the floor.

French Committee Chairman Richard Pope (IV Trin) will also speak, about the proposed march on Queen's Park to present a statement to Premier John Roberts on the subject of the upcoming Federal-Provincial Fiscal conference.

Any interested students should go to this meeting to find out what students in Canada are doing.

Positions open for WUS seminar in Algeria

Forty Canadian students will have an opportunity to go to Algeria next summer—if they can get into the country.

The World University Service of Canada, working with the Canadian government, has for the past 15 years provided scholarships for Canadian students who wish to attend a six-week summer seminar. The seminar next summer will be conducted by the Algerian branch of WUS.

At the seminar in Pakistan last year, students had to fight government censorship of study topics. With the present situation in Algeria it seems likely that there will be similar difficulties next summer.

Both the provincial and federal governments sponsor the seminar, and three-quarters of the cost—$1,000 this year, paid by the local WUS committee. The delegate himself is responsible for the remaining $250.

This cost includes travel expenses, a week-long orientation in Montreal and accommodation.

The University of Toronto last year sent three students delegates and one faculty member to the Pakistan conference. This year they will again send three students, but there is a possibility that more faculty members will be included.

Applicants must be presently enrolled at U of T and must be returning to the campus in the fall. They must be Canadian citizens with a working knowledge of French.

A seven-member nominating board has been set up to review applications and conduct interviews.

Applications now are available in the registrar's office and the SAC office, and deadline for application is Wednesday.

New library for Connaught

Plans for a $350,000 library for the Connaught Medical Research Laboratories were announced Friday by President Claude Bissell.

The new structure at the Steeles Ave. and Dufferin St. location will be built in memory of the late Balmer Neilly, a former University of Toronto engineering graduate who died in 1956.

A gift of $150,000 plus an interest-free loan for the remainder of the cost was made available by Mrs. Neilly.

The library will provide about 12,000 feet of floor space, replacing cramped temporary quarters which have housed the research collection at the Dufferin division during the last five years.

The library is part of a general development at the Dufferin division—which already has 69 buildings on its 200-acre site.

student government

Last week the university committee of the Students' Administrative Council announced it would be conducting open hearings on all aspects of student government.

The committee has invited all students and staff members to bring their ideas and opinions on what types of activity students and student governments could or should participate in.

These hearings provide students with an unparalleled opportunity to shape the future of student government at this university.

The success or failure of the hearings depend on the students themselves. A mere lineup of students presenting complaints about the SAC will be helpful, but in the long run will not contribute a great deal.

But persons with ideas on the possibilities of student participation in the various facets of university academic and administrative affairs will be able to provide the committee with a wealth of ideas.

For example, should students have a formal voice in academic affairs? Should a decision made by one of the academic departments be subject to formal student criticism? Should students have a seat on the Senate, the university's supreme academic body?

Should the SAC be responsible for its own financial affairs? Should there be a student centre at the University of Toronto?

Would it be possible for a body of administrative, faculty and student representatives to govern the university?

Is it possible for students to build and run a residential college, hiring their own faculty members and administering their own affairs?

All these are legitimate questions that require investigation and discussion.

This university is in a process of change insofar as its governmental structure is concerned. The persons who should make some sort of positive contribution to this changing structure are the students.

The committee is not asking for highly informative reports or submissions; it mainly wants to find out what student views are on all aspects of student government.

It is the responsibility of the students at this university at least to think about the issue. If they have any views on any aspect of the questions they should take time to make their views known to the committee.

know the reasons

This week students will be hearing a great deal about French Canada and will be asked to participate in the march on Queen's Park Friday.

It is to be expected that many students will recoil from the suggestion that they take part in a demonstration, and will pay no attention to the arguments which are offered.

But as citizens of a country which may be split because of a lack of understanding and as students in a changing social structure it is important that these students listen to the arguments. If they do nothing else they at least should understand the issue and the reasons why others are marching.

If they then choose not to march they will do so with the knowledge that they have investigated the problem and made a decision based on understanding of the situation.

It can be an uncomfortable feeling to know you did not act because of inertia

Le Canada: un illogisme

par ALAIN BROUILLARD
Special to The Varsity

Le Canada fait face actuellement à des troubles internes très graves d'ordre économique, social autant que politique.

Il est bien évident qu'au point de vue économique, le Canada se trouve dans une dépendance très étroite vis-à-vis de son voisin du Sud. L'économie canadienne est entre les mains des capitaux étrangers, pour la plupart, américains. La force ouvrière se trouve également dans cet état de dépendance envers les grandes unions américaines. Le Canada a donc à subir l'exploitation des Etats-Unis, exploitation à laquelle il n'existe qu'un remède: la planification; nous y reviendrons plus loin.

Le Canada ne peut résister aux pressions exercées sur lui parce qu'il doit exporter une trop grande partie de sa production.

L'insécurité s'installe chez l'industriel qui, n'ayant souvent que 20 per cent de ses produits consommés au Canada, doit trouver des mar-chés ailleurs, doit payer le prix de la forte concurrence internationale. Il ne peut pas toujours le faire. La planification serait la solution à ses problèmes, mais il en a peur. Il verrait d'un meilleur oeil l'annexion aux Etats-Unis, ce qui lui permettrait d'avoir un immense marché stable, indispensable à la survie d'un système capitaliste.

Ces difficultés économiques, ressenties avec plus d'acuité au Québec, y ont créé un malaise social. Le phénomène créditiste était une manifestation populaire de ce sentiment anti-capitaliste et anti-anglais, ce qui revient au même pour le Canadien-Français moyen. Pour lui, la planification ne peut se faire sans heurter de front l'Anglais, qui est son patron et qui vit largement.

C'est ainsi qu'est née la crise politique. Moitié parce qu'on voulait l'annexion comme groupe ethnique, moitié parce qu'on voulait exploiter ses muscles, il a voulu abattre le capitaliste anglais. Or, il lui semblait plus difficile de s'attaquer au capitaliste qu'à l'Anglais, il a donc décidé de s'attaquer à la Confédération. Le nationalisme séparatiste lancé par les intellectuels est en voie de recevoir l'appui du prolétariat, qui s'en servira dans sa lutte contre le capitalisme.

Face à des problèmes d'une telle ampleur, la Confédération, régime politique bien artificiel créé à Londres en 1867, va éclater. D'un côté, il y a le groupe anglo-saxon qui veut bénéficier du niveau de vie américain et qui aurait tout avantage à s'annexer aux "States"; de l'autre, il y a le groupe canadien-français qui, pour réaliser pleinement toutes ses possibilités, a besoin de l'indépendance. Ses intellectuels sont sensibles au mouvement de décolonisation. Ses prolétaires sont sensibles à la révolution socialiste internationale. C'est une Nation en marche vers la liberté.

Il y va de l'intérêt non seulement des Québécois, mais de tous les Canadiens, que la Confédération s'écroule et que chaque nation prenne l'orientation historique, qui est la sienne.

English translation

Canada faces at the present time very grave internal difficulties of an economic, social, and political nature.

It is very evident that, from economic point of view, Canada is extremely dependent on her neighbour to the south. The Canadian economy is in the hands of foreign capital, for the most part American. The work force is equally dependent on the great American unions. Canada therefore has to undergo exploitation by the United States, exploitation for which there is only one remedy: planning. We shall return to it later.

Canada cannot resist the pressures made on her, because she must export too big a part of her production.

Insecurity takes hold of the industrialist who, often having only 20 per cent of his products consumed in Canada, has to find markets elsewhere, and has to pay the price of strong international competition. He cannot always do this. Planning would be the solution to his problems, but he fears it. He would rather see annexation to the United States, which would enable him to have a huge stable market, indispensable for the survival of a capitalistic system.

These economic difficulties, felt more acutely in Quebec, have created the social malaise there. The Social Credit phenomenon was a popular demonstration of this anti-capitalist and anti-English feeling, both of which come down to the same thing, as far as the average French-Canadian is concerned.

As far as he is concerned, there could be no planning without coming into direct collision with the English, who are his employers and who live on a high scale.

Thus was born the political crisis. Partly because they wanted to destroy French Canadian as an ethnic group, partly because they wanted to exploit his muscles, he wanted to overthrow the English capitalists.

Now then; because it seemed to the French Canadian more difficult to attack the capitalist than the English, he decided to attack confederation. The separatist nationalism launched by the intellectuals is not far from receiving the support of the proletariat, which will use it in its struggle against capitalism.

Confronted by problems of such a scope, Confederation, a very artificial political regime created in London in 1867, is going to split apart.

On the one hand there is the Anglo-Saxon group which wants to benefit from the American standard of living and which would come off the best by annexation to the States; on the other hand, there is the French-Canadian group, which, to achieve all its potentialities fully, needs independence. Its intellectuals are conscious of the movement of decolonisation. Its proletariat is conscious of the international socialist revolution. It is a nation on the way to Liberty.

It is in the interests not only of the Quebecois, but of all Canadians, that Confederation collapse and that each nation take the historic orientation that is properly its own.

Probably less than one undergraduate in fifty is aware that the largest and most meaningful collection of Canadiana is housed at the rear of the Sigmund Samuel Library.

The Sigmund Samuel Canadian Gallery and the provincial archives are located opposite the west door of the Parliament Buildings on Queen's Park Crescent.

The Gallery was built in 1949 by the late Dr. Sigmund Samuel to display and store his private collection of early Canadian pictures and prints which outgrew the facilities available for them in the Royal Ontario Museum. Both Gallery and contents were donated to the University and the Province of Ontario by a joint-tenancy arrangement.

The collection was greatly enlarged both in size and scope under the direction of the late F. St. George Spendlove, one of the pioneers of Canadiana.

Mr. Scott Symons who succeeded Mr. Spendlove in 1962 is currently in charge of collections.

Relatively, the Gallery is thriving. Attendance has increased by 50 per cent in the past couple of years, and the public is beginning to notice the gaily-coloured posters which feature Cabot's ship, the "Mathew", and the "chantier quebécois."

Another interesting feature is the presentation.

The Gallery has a truly "avant-garde" layout—designed with an artistic perception which makes it unrivalled in this continent.

To-day the intelligent Canadian is acknowledging more and more that he is the proud victim of a strong cultural cross-current. The Canadian is essentially North American, but with European standards; he is American, but something more.

gures of Champlain, Wolfe, Brock and Simcoe which austere look down from the facade. Once inside the door the uninitiate must prepare for an adventure.

The spirit of the nation-builders emerges far more fully than from inadequate text-books.

As 17th, 18th, and 19th century Canada confronts the interested, one is struck by what the Curator calls the "dialogue between civilized and sophisticated cultures and the frontier". Mr. Symons Niagara frontier.

The Indian medals from the reigns of George II and George III reflect the vicissitudes of the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812 and the part played by the Indian tribes in the defence of the Empire.

There are also fascinating collections of china and silver. But for those less appreciative of these smaller treasures, there remains the thrill of seeing history.

From the wall hangs the large Benjamin West Death of Wolfe; Field-Marshal Townshend and Montcalm stand not far away.

One can see Wolfe's field desk and Montcalm's sword; Louis Riel's letter inciting the Metis to revolt in the west and the Nova Scotia Charter given to Alexander, Earl of Stirling in 1621.

There are ship's model's and early maps, not to mention an early rocking horse and the fine Cantonese Export-Ware imported by the explorer Alexander MacKenzie for his Montreal dining room.

Through the media of what are usually referred to as the British "topographical artists" who arrived with the British army of occupation (and later), one can see the very best type of record of British North American life after 1759.

Richard Short sketches a Quebec City blasted by British cannons; George Heriot paints in watercolour the ruins of the Intendants' Palace at Quebec; while Capt. Hervey Smythe ('Aid de Camp to the late General Wolfe') recaptures scenes he loved on the mighty St. Lawrence (some of which were published as early as 1760).

And so onemoves through the past into an understanding of the present.

Fine maple, walnut, cherry, and mahogany furniture reflects the craftsmanship and designs of the Regency style in English-Canadian furniture.

Silver monstrosities and other religious silver-smithing unveil the history of New France, of Laval and his artisans founding the arts in what is now modern Quebec.

Through the Gallery one understands not only Anne Langton and Susanna Moodie roughing it in the Canadian bush, but also the significance of peaceful, stately Niagara-on-the-Lake, of the tiny parish churches on the Ile d'Orleans, and of the unrivalled splendour of the Basilica at Quebec City.

All this one sees despite the fact that space only allows 5 per cent of the Canadiana Collections to be displayed at one time.

The Canadiana Gallery is not merely a showpiece. It is the centre of productive research into the Canadian experience. Books are being written which will convey a meaningful picture of a distinctive Canadianism. The curator is constantly beset by invitations to lecture and speak which reflects expanding public interest. Furthermore pictures on temporary loan from this Gallery hang in exhibits from Vancouver to Charlottetown.

Most important the Gallery is a gage, a challenge thrown at the feet of those who deny that Canada has a culture. It represents a faith and pride of Canadians in their heritage.

Suffice it to say that the Canadiana Gallery is a daily memorial service to the aspirations and sacrifices of our forefathers.

For the undergraduate it is an opportunity to hold a Service of Remembrance of Things Past—a few moments silently listening to the voices of the past so we may not fail in the future.

To The Editor of The Varsity

The review of Ernest Watkins' book "R.B. Bennett" in the Varsity Weekend Review of Nov. 8th contains a statistical error.

Your reviewer states: "During his regime, 'Iron heels' Bennett outlawed an insignificant Communist party and deported over 10,000 people a year."

Questioning in the House of Commons, on his other hand, revealed the following deportation statistics: 1931, 6,097; 1932, 6,976; 1933, 4,679; 1934, 1,545.

The lack of a few thousand hapless deportees may not alter your reviewer's sweeping indictment of Watkins' work. Students interested in the evolution of Canadians' civil rights, however, will find the correct statistics more informative than the well-rounded number presented by the reviewer, Mr. Melvin Pelt.

Canada overgoverned

By BRUCE LEWIS

Canada is the most over-governed country in the world. Complaining about the delay in construction of public housing, the Toronto Star of Nov. 5 says:

"Construction must wait while four governments—federal, provincial, Metro and local—with their multiplicity of boards, commissions, officials and agencies, talk, debate and poise their rubber stamps. Any one of these can bog a project down, or delay it. Any one can postpone action, slow its progress."

This is the crisis in confederation, just as much as the relations between English and French.

It is not peculiar to Toronto only. Prospects are that new Metropolitan governments will be founded. But the answer is not to eliminate Metro. It is the provincial government that should be abolished.

Modern federal political parties believe in "co-operative" federalism. This is an expedient someone dreamed up to get around the fact that the provinces have more duties than they should have, while the federal government has more money.

"Give the provinces the money," say some. "Give the federal government the duties," say others.

The fact is that if you give the provinces the power and responsibility of raising their own revenue within the province, you put the poorer provinces on a standard perpetually below that of Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta and Quebec.

The answer to this has been equalization payments and "joint plans". By means of these the federal government subsidises the poorer provinces using money raised in the richer provinces. But every one of these "co-operations" leads to the inefficiency and extra expense that the Star complains of above.

And the federal government is unable to institute comprehensive measures of social reform and manipulate the economy in order to wipe out unemployment and ensure a reasonable rate of growth. Also some of the country's ablest political leaders expend their energy in the limited provincial sphere when not enough good material is available to form an effective federal cabinet.

If there were only one central government for Canada, it would administer all the functions of the present federal government. The provincial duties would be divided between the central government and the municipalities (the provinces already give the municipalities a good part of their functions). Some of the present provinces might be retained as administrative districts. But Ontario would probably be subdivided. There is no logical reason for saying that Northern Ontario has so much in common with "the golden horseshoe" that the two can't be separated. Indeed, why should they be together in the first place.

The only province that can bring a reasonable justification for its existence is Quebec. Its people do (largely) form a homogeneous group with legitimate interests to protect. But these can better be protected if they are embodied in a Bill of Rights written into the new constitution. They would then be interpreted and enforced by the Supreme Court, acting on principle and divorced from everyday politics. Protection for the Quebecois would be more effective than it is under the provincial organisation.

There is now in progress a "grand inquiry" into the state of Confederation. There will soon be a Dominion-Provincial conference at which all the vested interests of the provinces will attempt to enhance their individual power and authority at the expense of the power and authority of the people of Canada acting as a whole.

In both these forums Quebec will demand "fiscal autonomy" and special financial concessions. If it appears that any of these will be granted Ontario will demand the same concessions.

Ontario has a sound basis for demanding them. Why should it subsidize the rest of Canada? Quebec has that basis and something more. It wants the money to preserve the special characteristics of its people and ensure them equality of opportunity.

The first basis is not sound for either. These provinces (especially Ontario) are the industrial centres of the country. They have become this because of the physical advantages of their location, because of the benefit of the national market.

But the second reason is applicable to Quebec. Its people do have special characteristics which should be preserved, not simply for themselves but because they give Canada a tremendous potential for cultural development and enrichment. And they do not now have the equal opportunity of other Canadians.

But it would be detrimental to Canada as a whole if this were accomplished by splitting Quebec off from the rest of the country. The answer is rather to encourage mingling and understanding among individuals of both cultures.

In political terms this means that Quebec should not be given "fiscal autonomy" as a means to providing protection and equality of opportunity. If this same protection and equality of opportunity is provided by the federal government, the practical basis of demands for autonomy will disappear, no matter how much the intellectuals and political theorists rant on. Cure the illness with an acceptable cure, and the pernicious cure doesn't have to be used.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Interfac all-stars to meet Soccer Blues

By AL SCHOENBORN

In a daring show of enthusiasm, the interfac soccer league has organized an All-Star team. This select squad will play Varsity Soccer Blues Wednesday at 12:30 p.m. on the front campus.

The All-Stars were selected in the following manner: Each team qualifying for the playoffs in Division I contributes two men plus a substitute; the remaining Division I teams contribute one man each; and each Division II team in the playoffs will contribute one player.

Under the above system, the following squad has been selected:

COACH: Wilf Neidhardt (Vic).

FULLBACKS: Bob MacIntyre (Knox), William Barneveld (Trin), Anthony Burt (Trin), Fred Bienefeld (UC).

HALFBACKS: Casey Daleman (SMC), Lennox Borel (SMC), Ivan McFarlane (Trin), Eric Sereda (SPS), Lee Cairns (Vic).

FORWARDS: Ferdinand Wagner (Arch), Sven Dohnberg (Law), Graham Shiels (SPS), Nick Roussanoff (UC), Peter Boeckle (UC), Andy Rode (PHE), Peter Marsh (Vic).

There will be a practice tonight for both the Interfac All-Stars and the Soccer

Blues on the back campus at 5 p.m.

In soccer league play last week, Trinity A kept its Division I playoff hopes alive with a 2-0 win over Jr. SPS. The Red and Black goals were scored by John Mason and Derwyn Sangster.

In Division II, Law completed an undefeated season with a 1-0 squeaker over Forestry. Miles Godfrey counted the only goal of the match.

Winless Emmanuel defaulted its final game to Knox, while SPS III shutout UC II 4-0, and Trinity B downed Vic II 2-0.

LACROSSE

UC star Garry Kiziak, held to one goal for half the season, finally broke loose Thursday for seven goals in Redmen's 13-3 rout of Pharmacy.

Dave Perraton, Aubrey Sugar, Paul Sharkey, and Rick Shepherd added singles for the winners while Ken Fraser led Pharmacy with a pair. Pharmacy goalie Rick Pearen got credit for the third counter when a rebound found its way into the UC net at the other end of the gym.

Knox College upset Trinity's powerhouse 5-4 in Group III play as Grant Leishman scored a hat trick for the winners. Dave Scott was the pick of the losers with two goals.

Garry Watte continues to be a one-man show for Forestry. His latest effort was a three-goal performance in the lumbermen's 4-1 win over Pre-Meds I.

HOCKEY

The pace is already hot and heavy as action is getting under way in interfac hockey at Varsity Arena.

Defending Jennings Cup champions Victoria started the season off on the right foot with a 3-0 victory over PHE I.

Wilson scored a first-period goal for the winners, while Keith Noble rounded out the scoring with two second-half counters.

Two new Group III entries, Pharmacy A and Jr. SPS played to a 1-1 tie in the other game. Orest Seychuk scored for the Rexallmen while Charlie Singer replied for Skule.

RUGGER

Recent action has cleared up the rugger playoff picture. PHE A took second place in Group I after defeating winless SPS, 23-3, while Meds B dropped to third place, defaulting to Vic. I.

Wayne Wessell contributed three tries and Craig Williamson three converts to the PHE victory.

New College upset Knox, 3-0, in Division II but fell one point short of qualifying for the playoffs. Mort scored the try for New College.

St. Mike's took first place in Group II after a 3-0 win over Vic IV on a try by John Leon. In another game John Stubbs scored ten points to lead Trinity B to a 16-0 rout of Meds. C.

Hockey Blues bomb Waterloo-Lutheran 12-2 in strictly "no contest"

By GORD BELLMORE

It was strictly no contest at Varsity Arena Friday night as Varsity Blues buried Waterloo-Lutheran Golden Hawks in an exhibition hockey game, 12-2. The outcome was certain from the opening face-off and Waterloo's chief concern quickly became that of keeping the score down.

The visitors hung on until the third period when they tired badly and Blues blasted 36 shots at overworked Jack Parn in the Hawks goal. Parn stopped 57 shots in the course of the game and starred in defeat.

Blues' assault was led by classy rookie Don Fuller, who scored four goals. Bob McClelland, George Olah and Bryan Tompson all counted twice and singles went to Pete Speyer and Austin MacKay.

Waterloo's goals came in the second stanza, the best period for them, as Terry Gilbertson and Don Desjardine tallied.

Little can be concluded about Blues from this affair as they never got out of second gear in the entire game, even though they did net 12 goals, and they weren't even breathing hard at the finish. Even with five top players missing, Blues still completely handcuffed Golden Hawks.

On the other hand, Hawks were short four first stringers who have yet to join the team and Hawks only had a week's practice before journeying to Toronto.

Blues' first real test of the season comes Wednesday when they play Queen's Cup champions McMaster Marliners in an exhibition game at Dundas. McMaster returns the visit here Friday night at the Arena.

It took Blues 10 minutes to solve Parn's magic before they started the route with three quick goals. Varsity made it 6-0 in the second period before Waterloo finally found the mark. The second period ended with the score 7-2.

The roof fell in for Hawks in the final period as Blues counted five unanswered goals.

Besides the sharpshooting and scrappy play of the alert Fuller, several other Blues served notice that they are in for big seasons. Particularly impressive was the solid defensive play of stocky rookie Bob Hamilton, a Hamilton Red Wing grad.

Peter Speyer looked more at home on defence than at any time last season when he was shifted to the blue line to fill Blues' lack of defencemen.

With Hamilton, Speyer and the classy Ian Sinclair, Blues have the nucleus of a solid defence to back up their potent attack. Sinclair has been slow rounding into shape this season but he still was the most efficient player on the ice with his heady playmaking and flawless checking.

STRAY SHOTS: Pete Speyer, Don Fuller and Jack Parn were selected by Rick Kollins as the three stars... The total shots on goal were 69-20... Varsity rookie Jerry Marlborough picked up a mouthful of stitches when he stepped in the way of an errant stick... Sonny Osborne collected four assists for Blues as he directed a makeshift line with George Olah and Don Fuller. This line scored seven goals.

Rugger Blues, coach and footballer turn back Toronto Wanderers, 18-0

A UTRFC Syndicated Service

An exhibition University of Toronto rugger side of 13 Blues, coach Dick Gactor, and footballer Jim Fisher embarrassed Toronto Wanderers 18-0 Saturday on the back campus.

Toronto hit the scoresheet quite early in the opening half on Bill Charlton's try and Paul Wilson convert. But the name side squandered the remainder of the half passing the ball back and forgetting to move forward.

Varsity readjusted its compass in the second half and easily ran up 13 points. Ian Sinclair counted two tries, both of which the Golden Toe converted. The final try by Jim Fisher came after Wilson and Rod Sanders had baffled the Wanderers' defence with a scissors feint.

In another exhibition match, Varsity Intermediates defeated Toronto Barbarians 11-6.

200 YARDS AHEAD OF ELLIS

Kidd wins Canadian harrier title

University of Toronto distance runner Bruce Kidd easily captured the Canadian Senior Cross-country Championship Saturday at McMaster University in Hamilton. Kidd finished 200 yards in front of his nearest competitor, Dave Ellis of Toronto Olympic Club.

Jim Irons of TOC placed third in the six-mile race, followed by Russ Evans of McMaster and Hylke Van der Wal of Western.

Kidd used Saturday's run as a prep for next weekend's Canadian Intercollegiate cross-country championship in Guelph.

ALBERTA UPSETS QUEEN'S 25-7

EDMONTON.—The Senior Intercollegiate Football League suffered a severe blow to its reputation as the top college conference in Canada as University of Alberta Golden Bears drubbed Queen's Golden Gaels, 25-7, here Saturday in the Golden Bowl.

The win for Alberta marked the first time in memory that a Senior Intercollegiate team has been defeated in a post-season game by a club from another college conference. It also gave Alberta some measure of revenge for the 46-7 lacing it took from McGill Redmen in an east-west clash in 1960.

Golden Bears were inspired by a sensational effort from their defensive unit, outweighed by almost 15 pounds per man. The defence allowed Queen's to penetrate Alberta territory only twice during the game while the offence responded with a 16-point outburst in the final quarter to increase a 9-7 three-quarter lead.

Alberta defenders hurled Gael backs for losses four times, held for no gain four times, allowed a ground gain of more than five yards only six times, recovered two fumbles, intercepted one pass, and collected a safety touch.

The crowd of 7,500 roared as Golden Bears stopped Queen's on the Alberta three-yard line on the final play of the game. Students mobbed Alberta players at the final gun and it was several minutes before Lieutenant - Governor J. Percy Page could present the Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta Trophy to Bears' captain Ron Marteniuk. The trophy was donated especially for the Golden Bowl.

Fullbacks Bert Carron and Irwin Striffler and halfback Ken Neilson scored touchdowns for Alberta. Marteniuk kicked a field goal and two converts and Golden Bears added a safety touch to complete their scoring.

Cal Connor gave Queen's its only t.d. in the third quarter on a sparkling 90-yard dash. Jim Young added the convert.

The passing of quarterback Gary Smith was Bears' major weapon as they moved ahead 7-0 in the first quarter, 9-0 in the second and notched 16 points in the final 15 minutes. Smith completed 16 of 27 passes for 277 yards.

Bears were held to a net 64 yards rushing, but 31 came in their last-quarter scoring burst.

Connor's long run accounted for almost half of Queen's 138 yards along the ground. The Gael quarterback completed five of 17 passes for 94 yards, including a 43-yarder to halfback John Latham in Queen's last-minute 92-yard march that was stopped at Bears' three-yard line.

Defensive end Larry Ferguson and fullback Jim Young were Gaels' outstanding players. Ferguson made 20 per cent of the tackles on Bears' offensive plays. Young was the top ground-gainer in the game — 68 yards on 13 carries—and played a solid game at defensive half.

The victory leaves Alberta and St. Francis Xavier X-Men of the Atlantic Conference as the only undefeated college teams in the nation. Bears finished their Western Conference season with a 6-0 record, the same as Queen's in the Senior Intercollegiate League.

St. Francis Xavier, which plays Varsity Blues Saturday at Halifax in the Atlantic Bowl, were 7-0 in the Atlantic Conference.

NAPOLEON, HITLER AND NOW FRANK TINDALL

It happened to Napoleon I in 1812.

It happened to Adolph Hitler in 1941.

And now, in 1963, it's happened to Queen's Golden Gaels. So you don't get the connection between Napoleon, Hitler and Queen's Golden Gaels?

It's like this . . . Napoleon and Hitler were both regarded as the most powerful forces of their age. They had Europe at their command. But that wasn't enough for these rascals. They wanted more.

So what did they do?

They set out to conquer the Great Russian Bear. In both cases, it was quite a gamble. Napoleon and Hitler had relatively little to gain by conquering Russia, but they had everything to lose if they were defeated. You know the rest of the story. Napoleon and Hitler couldn't cope with the Russian Bear on its own territory. Eventually they lost everything.

Queen's Golden Gaels were also regarded as a power—the top college football team in Canada for 1963. But they too set their sites on a bear—the University of Alberta Golden Bear, representing the championship of Western Canada college football. Gaels travelled to Edmonton to meet the Bears in the first Golden Bowl. Their reputation was shot. They lost to Bears, 25-7.

Word has it that Gaels coach Frank Tindall wasn't keen on taking his charges to Edmonton. Wise Frank realized that if he won the game, observers would say: "So what, the western teams aren't nearly as good as the Senior Intercollegiate teams." But if Gaels were to lose, the same observers would be quick to comment that Western intercollegiate teams are ready to compete with our Eastern teams and that Gaels aren't the best college football team in Canada.

Anyone who knows anything about college football in this country will not stand convinced that University of Alberta Golden Bears are a better team than Queen's, even though they did upset Gaels, 25-7. Any football team can be better than another, within reason, on any given day. And when there are external factors to consider, the underdog's chances are even greater on that particular day.

DALT WHITE KNOWS THE STORY BACKWARDS

It has to be considered that Gaels travelled to a strange city 2,500 miles away to play a team that had everything to gain and little to lose in the Golden Bowl. Bears were bound to be more inspired for the game than Gaels, considering that they were playing a team regarded as much superior to themselves. And besides, Queen's had few supporters in Edmonton for the game.

Gaels' situation going into the game is one which no coach would envy.

If you don't believe this, just ask Dalt White, coach of Varsity Blues. White faced the same dilemma one year ago when he took his team to Halifax for the Atlantic Bowl. White knew he had little to gain and everything to lose if he lost the game to St. Francis Xavier X-Men.

The Varsity players were introduced to a college football environment completely foreign to them. To Maritimers, the Atlantic Bowl is bigger than the Grey Cup. Parades, television, banquets, hi-jinks, parties, beauty queens, are all part of the Atlantic Bowl hullabaloo. The Varsity players were looked upon as celebrities in Halifax. This was big stuff.

But it was hard for the Varsity players to regard the game with the same anxiety and enthusiasm as the Maritimers and the St. F. X. players. Blues had heard little of the Atlantic Bowl before they went to Halifax. And when they saw Wanderers' Grounds, an ancient converted rugby field where the game was to be played, they knew the whole thing was little more than "bush league" by their own standards.

As it turned out, Blues were just able to overcome the Maritimers' enthusiastic attitude with a second-half surge that resulted in a 20-14 win. Blues only won by six points and Maritimers were quick to calculate that St. F. X. was actually that close to Blues in strength.

But don't believe it. X-Men did nothing in the second half of the game once Blues found themselves. If the two teams had met five more times in the following five weeks, Blues should have won handily each time. But I wouldn't have bet on it.

It's quite a gamble for a Senior Intercollegiate team to take on another conference opponent on its home grounds. Frank Tindall learned this the hard way. Dalt White is hoping he won't have to.

ONLY VETERANS FROM 1960-61 SQUAD

West, Bordas, McElroy key for Cagers

By PAUL HENDERSON

Any 5 p.m. spectator at the weekday practices of Varsity Basketball Blues will undoubtedly notice three seasoned veterans among the 14 individuals seeking positions on the squad. Ed Bordas, Jerry McElroy and Dave West are the only regulars from the team of three seasons ago still active.

In his first year after graduation from Cathedral High in Hamilton, Bordas hooped a total of 192 points for Blues. That's a game average of 10.2.

Ed sat out the 1961-2 season, but roared back last year. Capitalizing on fine rebounding and tough under-the-basket play, he scored 158 points in 12 league contests for a 13.2 average. This mark placed him ninth in the OQAA loop.

Sole fourth year man with the team is 6'3" Jerry McElroy. Jerry came to U of T from De La Salle High School where he led his team in point-getting. Employing a good jump shot, he compiled 175 points and a 9.2 average in his freshman year.

The following season, McElroy netted 230 points in league action, and consequently was Blues' top scorer with a commendable 16.5 tally per game. Last season, Jerry slumped to an average of 10.6, but still good enough for 14th spot in the league.

Perhaps the most illustrious of this triumvirate is Dave West. Dave stepped of the court at Bloor Collegiate adapted so well he led Blues in scoring in both his two active seasons.

Last year, West hopped 247 points in 12 regulation tilts.

His 20.6 average won him second place in OQAA scoring honors and selection as guard on the first All-Star team. In addition, Dave was awarded the Dr. Potter Trophy as the player regarded the most deserving by his teammates, and he captains this year's team.

In Varsity's first exhibition game, tentatively scheduled against the Dow Kings, the play of Bordas, McElroy, and West should be most conspicuous. No specific date has been set for the contest.

VOL. 83 — NO. 24 — NOV. 20th, 1963

A statement by Doug Ward

Many of you have expressed concern over the generality of the brief which we shall be presenting to Prime Minister Roberts this Friday.

It is true that it would be much easier for us to organize a march in protest, one which outlined specific grievances and definite answers. In one way, we are marching in protest, against the lack of involvement our population has assumed in the face of the grave tasks which face our premier next week.

But we have decided to march in a more positive stance, and the letters you may read on Page 4 of this issue from French-speaking Canadians suggest that they concur with our idea.

At the turn of the century, Canada was caricatured as a railroad in search of a nation. Today, Canada appears to possess a French-speaking nation in search of a partner. Quebec has been pushing for years against the cotton wool of our quietude. The only statements which the press has considered newsworthy have been the posturings of the extremists in both camps. What is needed is the sound voice of a well-informed and vitality interested segment of our population, and here is where we can take the lead.

We affirm that we want to live in a country in which both French and English-speaking populations will work co-operatively, resulting in betterment which is inevitable from such exchange.

We do not demand that Premier Roberts crawl to French Canada's requests if they prove unreasonable.

All we want him to do is be aware of the ramifications of dealing with Quebec with less than the future of Canada as the criterion.

Many student organizations have decided that a march on Queen's Park is the best way we can assume a position of leadership and give substance to our concerted feelings.

They will be marching for Canada Friday and they need your active support.

Toronto mayor dies at 48

Toronto Mayor Donald Summerville died Tuesday night after he suffered a heart attack while playing an exhibition hockey game.

The mayor, who was 48, had been tending goal for about five minutes when he suffered the attack. He was taken to the dressing room of the George Bell arena and then to St. Joseph's hospital.

Mr. Summerville was also scheduled to attend the reception after the opening performance of Skule Nite last night.

The mayor had one son attending the University of Toronto.

March for Canada

BACKGROUND

An ad hoc committee of students working last week in connection with the Canadian/Canadien Committee of the SAC have prepared a brief for presentation to Premier John Roberts expressing the concern of the student body over the coming Federal-Provincial Conference.

All students have been urged to accompany the brief to Queen's Park from the flag pole behind the SAC building this Friday at 1 p.m.

DEVELOPMENTS

- Premier John Roberts has stated he will meet students when they present brief Friday.

- President Claude Bissell, after expressing his regrets that he will be out of the city and unable to address students at today's meeting, stated:

"I congratulate the Students' Administrative Council on organizing an affirmation march to the Parliament buildings. It is above all a demonstration that students at this university will not stand idly by and simply watch the stream of events."

- The Engineering Society last night almost unanimously agreed to support the march.

- The Victoria College Union last night unanimously agreed to support the march.

- Several executive members from other college and faculty councils expressed their intentions to introduce similar motions before Friday.

TODAY

Professor Paul Fox of the department of political economy will address a general student meeting today at 1 p.m. in Sidney Smith Hall to provide information on the Quebec crisis. Doug Ward, SAC president, will speak on the need for student action and the organization of the march.

THURSDAY

Premier Roberts is the guest speaker at Thursday night's Hart House Debate, at 8 p.m. Admission is by ticket only, which are available at the hall porter's desk.

INFORMATION

Don Monro, president of the Engineering Society, has called for volunteers to make placards tonight and Thursday night in the Engineering stores, phone 928-2916.

Volunteers are needed for a telephone campaign. Anyone wishing to help with the march or for additional information call 923-5921 between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

—ESP FENOR

It's dark as a determined student tries again and again to make the button on the traffic light at St. George and Willcocks Sts. have some effect. The latest game has no prize, not even a safe crossing: the button's a planned dud.

Dont push that button: It's a fake

If University of Toronto students can't trust the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, they certainly can't trust city police or even traffic engineers.

The reason? The traffic light at Sidney Smith Hall has been a strictly regular-operating light for over two weeks. The thousands of buttons pushed by students in a hurry have meant nothing.

Push as will and trust the Powers as you will, you have to wait 45 seconds for a green light to cross St. George St. The button is only a pacifier.

The problem T-corner started giving drivers headaches last year when traffic would be held up for up to five minutes during class changes. The pedestrian crosswalk was replaced by a pedestrian-regulated stop light.

Complaints evidently still did not stop, and an automatic light six of them, in fact—was installed and synchronized with the lights at the Harbord-St. George and College-St. George intersections.

A city employee Tuesday declined to reveal his name after he had confessed of the push-button treachery unnoticed for weeks.

Perhaps the RCMP has its thumb around downtown as well as in this university, and even on a traffic light.

So don't push. Just stop traffic

SMC writes Pearson

The Student Christian Movement has sent a letter to Prime Minister Lester Pearson commending the government for the relief shipments sent to Cuba and powdered milk being sent there through the Canadian Red Cross.

However, the letter adds in part: "... we wonder if the government's action so far is a sufficient expression of the humanitarian concerns of Canadians. Canada sent great quantities of goods to Cuba while there was money in it, but now her trading partners are in distress, and not only has her response so far been rather mediocre in quantity, but she has failed to carry through and make her allocated relief available to hungry people in the most critical post-disaster (hurricane Flora) period.

"Any consideration of political 'expediency' would be regrettable, when humanitarian concerns should be the only criteria."

Says Fatalism is unliveable

Rev. William Whitla underlined free will as the basis of man's existence in a speech on "Free Will vs. Fate" at the Student Christian Movement Tuesday.

He said fatalism was unliveable. The fatalist or anti-theist is "left with the grim domain of fate" from which there is no escape, except through luck or chance, he said. On the other hand the theist or believer in free will feels that life is an exhilarating experience.

A sincere, rational act is freer than an insincere, irrational act as an enlightened will is freer than an unenlightened will, he said.

Then Mr. Whitla, a humanities professor at York University posed the question: "If God is omniscient, how can man have free will?"

Mr. Whitla answered that it is impossible to live without free will. He cited the example of a person driving his car. Without free will it would be nearly impossible for the person to move it, he said.

To produce Broadway hit

Mickities, the annual St. Michael's College stage production, will this year feature the Broadway hit, The Boyfriend. The show starts Thursday.

Couples career around the stage in a raccoon coat atmosphere, breaking into song and dance at frequent intervals.

Characters are drawn from the French Riviera, where Americans, English and French mill around to the sound of the music of the 20s.

From the sophisticated French headmistress of a girls' school to the lecherous old English lord, the plot abounds in type characteristics and "happier-ever-after" denouements.

There are three complete changes of set in the play.

Director Peter Boretski has already done The Boyfriend in England and the United States. He has just finished producing Antigone for the Festival series on CBC.

The Boyfriend will be presented Nov. 21-23 at the Ontario College of Education auditorium. Tickets are available at the SMC Coop.

U of T's own Santa Claus parade

An Engineering Santa Claus will make his first appearance on campus today at 1 p.m.

A parade featuring the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, several elves, and Santa himself will tour the campus and end up at the Engineering Stores.

During the next week Santa will be available in the Stores (Rm. 24, Electrical Building) to answer questions and hand out coloring books. Elves will appear upon request.

NFCUS cards still valid

Although the official name and exact nature of the national union of Canadian students are still in dispute, the old money-saving identification cards of the organization will soon be in circulation.

The cards, which entitle the bearer to discounts in many local stores and on national transportation facilities, will still bear the NFCUS label this year. Students' Administrative Council officials assure they will be no less valuable than previously.

The NFCUS committee is approaching city merchants to get discounts for students, and the full list will be published in advance of the Christmas shopping rush.

The cards are free to every registered student.

An intramural "college bowl" may be the latest source of competition-that-unites on campus. Five-man teams from any two colleges or schools will contend in large lecture rooms during noon hours. Five matches have already been held, all successful. The Bowl format of 10-point qualifying and 20-point bonus questions will be used. High-total schools will play off.

Needed now is a group of volunteer undergraduates to compose questions. A questionnaire will be sent to participating schools to test the competence in a variety of fields of the schools' teams.

The project, directed by Don Snider (II UC), has yet to receive final approval from the Caput.

A Nite of inconsistencies

by SALLY NESS

Skule Nite 6T4, which opened at Hart House last night, has gone campus-wide this year, both in audience and cast. The result is a show that is good, bad, indifferent . . . and certainly inconsistent.

Peter Grant's musical direction deserves praise throughout — starting with the national anthem(s). His arrangements are snappy, sparkling, and often brilliant. He has the special ability of being able to write the Skule theme in Bach, Chopin, and Rachmaninoff vein. At one point, Hart House goes stereophonic as he surrounds the audience with various members of the orchestra and chorus.

It is interesting to note, however, that the chorus is mainly from Vic and the orchestra contains only four Engineers. Even the Engineering song is crooned by an all-Arts quartet.

Equally fine is the choreography by Arline Patterson. Stick, professional and original numbers are spaced throughout the show. Especially good was Like Wow in Act 2, and the finale, Continental Salute.

"Scripts written by The Unmentionables" says the program, and often it is painfully clear why. Much of the material seems stale despite the efforts of the cast. Especially poor is Alchemy 3D, a didactic Marxist fairy tale, done in a most peculiar combination of costumes — and unfortunately the longest skit in the show.

A sketch about a funeral directly and unhumorously verges on bad taste and falls flat, as does 36-18-36, a sketch about unappealing Sirens.

Much better is a sketch about James Bond and a well-engineered number concerning a missile defence unit. The Skulemen have even produced a movie, which is amusing and original.

Wendy Turnbull deserves praise throughout for her comic portrayal. Her sense of timing and her flexible and expressive face and naturalness often save the show.

Rob Parker, in many roles, but especially that of the SNAFU janitor, is excellent and at ease on the stage.

Bob Ferguson in his sketches with Miss Turnbull, and Terry Spratt as James Bond and the drunk handle their roles cleverly and competently.

Phil Maude has an excellent singing voice, and throughout the show, with or without dancers, as MC is in command of the stage.

However, many of the minor players seem flat and unrehearsed. The difficult scripts may have something to do with this. Poor pacing makes many of the sketches drag.

The show is long, and much of this is due to periods of blackness between the numbers. Scene changing is somewhat confused, and a wandering spotlight seldom seems to hit its mark.

The sets by Pat Gangnon are superb. Colorful and original, they fit the mood of the show. They are numerous, never skimpy and usually complemented by good lighting. Costumes are adequate and at times excellent.

The Engineers may be the masterminds behind the show, but most of the talent is non-Skule. One gets the feeling that this mixture never quite jelled. Disunity and inconsistent standards mar what could otherwise have been a good show.

It should tighten up and improve as the week wears on. When it is good, it is very, very good, and when it is bad . . . Well go and see what you think. Artsmen and Skule alike should find it worth the effort.

By KEN DRUSHKA

A question which has been hotly debated among the leaders of the March for Canada, faculty members and skeptics during the last two weeks is whether the general student body has any knowledge of, and interest in, the French-Canadian crisis.

Many persons have maintained that the students at this university are not interested in the situation and do not see the possibility of drastic changes in Confederation, which could lead to the breaking up of Canada.

Others, including The Varsity, have maintained that students are not apathetic.

Acting mostly on faith the members of the latter group have worked to organize a march on Queen's Park for Friday.

There has certainly been no shortage of written material on the French-Canadian situation from which the students can draw the facts.

For the past two years Maclean's Magazine has given extensive coverage to the Quebec scene, and has said almost all that can be said on the subject.

The Toronto newspapers have been carrying a great deal on happenings in Quebec, although they often fail to understand what the individual events mean.

The Varsity today completes a series, Canada in Crisis, in addition to publishing several other articles on French Canada.

But in many quarters students act as though they are unaware of the existence of Quebec.

Monday I attended a third-year general course political science lecture on nationalism. This is the concentration subject for general course students, and one would assume that all students taking it would have more than a passing interest in politics.

The topic turned to Canadian nationalism, and for 10 minutes more than 25 students discussed the various ramifications of the subject — without once mentioning French Canada.

Finally it was suggested that any discussion on Canadian nationalism was incomplete without considering the implications of the French-Canadian situation.

None of the students present took up the issue or offered any comment on the Quebec crisis. The discussion on nationalism returned to a theoretical level.

When approached, the lecturer said the class had been discussing nationalism for almost three weeks. He said he had intentionally not mentioned French Canada in order to see if any of the students would bring up the subject. Until Monday none had.

But fortunately the rest of the campus does not appear to exist in such an uninterested state.

Students from the law school report that several lectures in the last two weeks have inevitably turned to the topic of the French and English-Canadian crisis.

I have been told that for the last week the subject has been predominant in the Engineering stores. Similar reports come in from various parts of the campus.

But I still find it almost inconceivable that a group of political science students should not even be willing to discuss the subject.

One can only hope that they will soon realize the significance of what is happening around them. Monday they reminded me of a meeting of visiting firemen, calmly discussing fire fighting techniques while the convention hall burned down around them.

CANADA IN CRISIS (10)

(This is the last article in the series on English-French relations in Canada.)

The moderate must act

by JIM LAXER
Varsity Features Editor

How is an English-Canadian to decide on a course of action or even of thought in the present Confederation debate?

We have heard arguments for the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada; some have advocated the assimilation of French-Canadians by the rest of Anglo-Saxon North America.

In spite of a confusing diversity of opinion, some definite facts seem to have emerged. There can be little doubt that Quebec is in the throes of the most explosive outburst of nationalist energy in Canadian history. Unless some accommodation of the moderate elements of Quebec is achieved in the near future separatism will become a very serious threat.

For most of us in the middle who are neither separatists or assimilationists, some course of action must be found.

I think we can reject the theory that Canada was merely founded as an adjunct to a railway; I think we can agree that Canada can only exist through the cooperation of her two great founding peoples — the English and French-Canadians.

As with most moderates we have tended to allow the extremists to hold the centre of the stage. In English Canada the voices of the W.A.C. Bennetts have been loudest; in French Canada the Marcel Chaputs have been heard from most frequently.

English-Canadians must not make the mistake of thinking that the French-Canadians are all intransigent. French-Canadians must give up the notion that their compatriots are all virulent members of the Orange Lodge.

The sane voices of compromise and reason that the Royal Commission on Biculturalism has called for must enter the debate.

These people both English and French-Canadians must make it clear that they are concerned about the future of Canada.

The irrelevant voices that have called for a polylingual or a unilingual Canada must not be allowed to predominate.

Canada is a bilingual country in fact and no other languages besides English and French can be granted official status.

New Canadians need to be educated in the historical and present day realities of the country they have made their home. They must be shown that Confederation marked the agreement of two peoples — and that the languages of these two peoples will always enjoy an official and an actual preponderance in Canada.

There are also numerous English-Canadians who allow themselves the luxury of dangerous misconceptions. Their belief that Canada is or ought to be a unilingual English-speaking country is as dangerous to Canadian unity as separatism.

The road of the moderate will be a difficult one. Students in the University of Toronto will be required to tread this path if they are to deserve a place in the national scene.

The theories have been presented; the crisis has been brought to our attention. We now are required to act.

We are required to act not because it is the radical thing to do or because we are Hell-raisers but because our country is in grave danger.

The university cannot form a sheltered corner apart from society. The University of Toronto must give English Canada the leadership that the University of Montreal has given French Canada.

The coming Federal-Provincial Conference will mark an important testing time for the moderate. But it will not be enough for the student to sit back and hope that all will be well. The time has come for the moderate to become involved.

Letters on the March for Canada

Moderates behind you

Mr. Douglas Ward, president Students' Administrative Council, University of Toronto
Cher ami,

As a proudly bilingual Canadian, and having read in the Montreal Star, of your forthcoming article to your Premier, in support of Quebec's aspirations, I am moved to offer you and your fellow-students a most hearty "Bravo".

This I offer you in my primary capacity as a Canadian, grateful for the splendid response of all our sane-thinking people, to the urgency of the present situation.

As I write this, it comes to me that we "moderates" have been just that, for much too long. Greatly outnumbering as we do the extremist few who keep hurling venom from their respective positions, we must shake off once and for all the apathy which has so long held us back, and drown out these discordant voices by the sheer volume of our multitude.

If our separatists, and I mean those of both sides, are so ringingly heard, it is only because of our own silence. At a time when she faces destruction from within, we owe it to our so great Canada, to join forces as we would if such a menace came from the outside.

Each of us must work at it and with the full means of his potential. As we do, we shall every day be gratified with the realization that, far from being alone, we are all together if not in direction, at least in intent.

The full cohesion of our thoughts will only be achieved after a full and "no holds barred" exchange, but don't think that, in our clamouring for recognition, we French-Canadians are heedless of the need for intelligent compromise.

If our agitation projects so vehemently our present and almost exclusive self-concern, it is only because we find ourselves so far behind, such poor cousins.

In promoting an idea which may place this so-essential exchange in its proper context, you and your association are making an admirable contribution to a sorely-needed betterment.

Be sure that, in doing so, you are helping us on our side, to satisfy our discontented and squelch, our unreasonable.

Pierre Beaudry
Montreal

An historical move

I don't want to be over optimistic but I believe that you will make an historical move. You show an honest, clever and positive approach to solve our common problems — the challenge that faces our country now. It would be so easy to solve if both French and English have your approach. I wish you that it will be a success. I morally support you and I will follow the news. Good luck.

Jean Pierre Mongeau
Montreal

Dislocated youth helped by Settlement

By MOIRA HENDERSON

Over 50 years ago the University Settlement was founded by a group of U of T faculty members intent on providing assistance to their less wealthy neighbours. The Settlement is now an independent United Appeal agency, housed in a pleasant modern brick and glass building just south of the Art Gallery.

Ties between the University and the Settlement have remained strong, however. In fact many of the Settlement programs are very largely dependent on manpower provided by student volunteers; in fact I was told time and time again how important these volunteers were, and how much their assistance was appreciated.

Inside the Settlement the atmosphere is informal and busy—like that of any neighbourhood community-centre. Settlement facilities include two gyms, an art room, two fully equipped kitchens, music rooms, a woodworking room complete with power tools and a swimming pool.

I was told that the Settlement is in almost constant use. During the day there are nursery-schools for the 2½ to 4½ year-olds, and physical-fitness classes for their mothers. After school there are classes in art, music and dancing; special clubs for different age-groups, and supervised activities in the gym. In the evening there are activities for adults—English and French classes, classes in sewing, dancing, and even wrestling and judo.

Mae Harmon, the Settlement club program supervisor, explained that Settlement activities are intended to do much more than provide entertainment. The activity program is given by experts, many of whom donate their services—particularly instructors in the music school—and is designed to develop interests and skills of members—thus giving them a source of lasting enjoyment.

Even more important, perhaps, is the Settlement club program. Here small interest groups meet together with a staff member. The staff member, a social-worker, or, quite frequently one of the university volunteers, can get to know each member of his group and find out where help is needed. Outstanding problems can be referred to an appropriate agency. Through the activities of each group an attempt is made to encourage the development of the personality of each individual so that he will be better able to solve his problems himself.

One of the biggest difficulties faced by the Settlement is the problem of making contacts with the neighbourhood people. Many are so busy they cannot come regularly to the Settlement, and often those who could benefit most from its services do not go.

For the past two years Jim Felstiner, an enthusiastic young lawyer and social-worker, has been using the Settlement House as the base of operations for a study into an aspect of this problem. Named officially "An exploratory and experimental project in detached street work", the study is concerned with learning about the population of youths, present in most large cities, who are completely isolated from every-day adult society.

Mr. Felstiner, a graduate of Haverford College Philadelphia and Harvard Law School, has long been interested in social-work, having worked with boys at training schools and in the Big Brother movement. After graduation he spent four months in delinquency research at Harvard and then went to Washington D. C. where he was law clerk at the juvenile court.

Mr. Felstiner hopes eventually to combine his two interests by becoming a Juvenile court judge. He came to the Toronto School of Social work to improve his qualifications for this post, and it was while he was completing his msw. that he first became interested in the problem of detached youth. Settlement officials had long been aware of the lack of contact with the boys, and so Mr. Felstiner's project was born.

Then came the business of contacting the detached boys near the Settlement house. Mr. Felstiner spent long hours a week hanging out in restaurants and pool halls, walking the streets and alleyways near the Settlement and visiting the boys' homes. The offer of the use of his car, a cigarette or just a sympathetic ear soon earned him acceptance, and his uncritical accepting attitude towards the boys gained him their confidence and friendship.

By the time Mr. Felstiner had finished his investigation 'on the street' he had made contact with a total of 120 boys and was covering a beat which extended from Bathurst to University Avenue on either side of Queen. Through his friendship he was able to help many with both sudden crises and the longer term problem of finding a better adjustment to family and school.

The result of the project is that much valuable information and insight has been gained into the world of the detached youth. But Mr. Felstiner emphasized that there was still a lot to be done. As a detached worker he has contacted only a portion of the boys in Toronto, and even here the number which were helped intensively by a social-worker was very small.

Many such young people make use of the swimming pool at the University Settlement Recreation Centre, 23 Grange Rd.

HOCKEY BLUES MEET MARLINS IN TWO-GAME SERIES

Probable preview of top-spot fight

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues travel to Dundas, Ont. tonight for a game against McMaster Marlins that should be a preview of the battle for first place in the newly organized seven-team intercollegiate league. Defending Queen's Cup champions Marlins return the visit Friday night at Varsity Arena.

Although the two games are only exhibition contests, the winner of the series, if there is one, will be favored to take the Queen's Cup this season.

Marlins lost several top performers from last year's squad, including Bill Mahoney, Butch Hyde and defenceman Ian Sinclair, now with Blues. Nevertheless, Marlins still have a solid core of veterans and several talented rookies, which should make them co-favorites with Varsity for the title.

Still intact is Marlins' top line of Pete Randle, Jim McLellan and Bob Pond, which was the scourge of the Western Division last season. Veteran Jimmy Cannon is back in goal.

Top rookies are former Junior "A" defenceman Jim McKendry from Neil McNeil and Bob Apps, son of former Maple Leaf great Syl Apps.

Marlins will put an impressive winning streak on the line tonight. They have not been knocked off on their home Dundas Arena pond in three seasons.

Blues' coach Joe Kane intends to break up his successful line of Sonny Osborne, George Olah and rookie Don Fuller, which scored seven goals against Waterloo-Lutheran last Friday. Hank Monteith, who did not play Friday, will move in at centre in place of Osborne, who goes to another line.

Kane was especially pleased with the work of Peter Speyer on defence against Waterloo-Lutheran. The defence is Blues' greatest area of improvement over last season and will get its first tough test against Marlins.

STRAY SHOTS: Wounded winger Steve Monteith, who just recently had the cast removed from his ankle, started light skating last night. Monteith tore ligaments playing football. The medics say he should be ready to go by the second or third game of the season, which could mean after Christmas. . . . Joe Kane does not expect all-star Stuart McNeil to play much this season because of medical studies. . . . Scoring star Ward Passi, who has been recovering from a football injury to his knee, should be ready for Friday's game here.

BEFORE TELY-MAPLE LEAF INDOOR GAMES

Gardens to hold college meet

By UNCLE HARRY

Pin-spikes, leather-encased shot, foam-rubber jumping pits, and cedar-banked tracks — this is the equipment which characterizes the track athlete's winter shift indoors. The boards season is not far off.

Indoor track at University of Toronto received a tremendous boost yesterday with the announcement the Telegram-Maple Leaf Indoor Games will loan the OQAA Conference the use of its facilities for an intercollegiate meet January 23, the afternoon of the Games.

In former years the scope of the U of T Track Club's indoor activities has been limited. The Club could only count on two meets — one in Hamilton and another in Michigan — and occasionally Bruce Kidd and Bill Crothers took along a relay team with them to one or two of the important US invitational meets.

But with the opportunity to compete annually in the Gardens, interest in indoor competition should mushroom to the point where the Garden's show will become an OQAA Championship.

The credit for obtaining an intercollegiate meet in the Gardens should go to several OQAA coaches who have also been prominent in Amateur Athletic Union circles. The AAU is the governing body for any track meet in Canada.

Both Varsity coaches, Hal Brown and Fred Foot, have led Canadian teams abroad, and McMaster's Ron Wallingford and Western's John Metras have frequently made their facilities available to the AAU. This time the AAU has returned the favor.

Blues will enter two competitors in each of the following events: pole vault, high jump, shot put, hurdles, 300-yard dash, 600-yard dash, 1,000-yard run, one-mile run, and two-mile run.

Blues are presently training each evening in Hart House at 5 p.m.

In the Infield: The Gardens has outlayed $25,000 for a new custom-built track. The track will be 11 laps to the mile.

Soccer Blues seek win and manager in today's game with interfac all-stars

By KATY O'SULLIVAN

Varsity Soccer Blues close their 1963 season when they meet the interfacy all-star team today at 12:30 p.m. on the front campus. The game will match the seasoned veterans of the Varsity squad, winners of the Blackwood Trophy, against a rough and determined interfacy eleven.

Missing from the all-star player list in Monday's Varsity were the two goalies, Andy Pastor (II PHE) and Walt Bulas (III SMC). Bulas, a member of last year's championship Varsity squad, should make goal scoring more difficult for Blues because of his knowledge of the team.

Bobby Lewis will be returning to Varsity's lineup for today's game. Sideline with a concussion for the last three weeks, Lewis will be back in his old forward position to frustrate the opposition's defence.

With their season ending, Blues are looking for a manager for next year's team. Again they are looking for a female to fill the job.

Qualifications for this post are skill in addition and subtraction (so that the team expenses come out correctly), a sense of humor (to cope with games played in the rain), the ability to cut oranges and pass out gum at the same time, and some respect for the game.

Fringe benefits of the job range from free oranges to a trip to McGill, while the disadvantages are too insignificant to be mentioned.

Any girl interested in the post is urged to come to today's game at 12:30 p.m. and speak to the team manager and to submit her name, year, and telephone number to the Athletic Office in Hart House. Or she may call team captain, Nick Walker at 923-0808.

St. Francis Xavier's record just grows and grows in Maritime ball

By PAUL McFARLAND
St. Francis Xavier

Antigonish, Nova Scotia — Because of the variance in competition, it is difficult to predict the outcome of the Atlantic Bowl football game between St. Francis Xavier X-Men and Toronto Varsity Blues at Halifax Saturday.

X-Men have coasted through their schedule, winning eight games in a row, while Blues have had a tough series of games. However, if statistics are to be accepted as any criterion, the team Blues meet Saturday may be the best ever assembled in the Atlantic provinces.

Eddie Amaral, a sophomore halfback, won the Atlantic Conference scoring championship with 100 points in eight games for a new league record. Halfback Tom Delaney, also of St. F.X., finished second in scoring with 72 points.

Amaral has rushed for a 9.6-yard average while Delaney averaged 7.2 yards per carry.

Fullback Joe Francoise, who faced Blues in last year's Atlantic Bowl, has averaged seven yards per carry, all yards gained through the middle of the line. The total backfield has averaged 7.9 yards per carry in rushing.

The pin-point passing of sophomore quarterback Doug Billing of Cornwall, Ont., has gained 564 yards on 37 completions in 69 attempts, and average of .536. Billing has thrown for nine t.d.s. He set a league record against Acadia by completing three consecutive passes for touchdowns on three successive plays from scrimmage.

Gord Pranschke, a rookie flanker, has been Billing's principle target, grabbing 11 tosses for 266 yards and five touchdowns.

With regard to team totals, the Xaverians have established new records in nearly every department. Their total yardage gained is 3,301 yards for an average of 7.7 yards per play.

X-Men set a new league record for one season with 405 total points scored, breaking their old mark of 310 set in 1960. They have averaged a phenomenal 50.6 points per game.

Defensively, Xaverians have never been better. They have held their opponents to a meagre 483 yards in 284 carries, intercepted 20 passes, a new record, and allowed only 21 points in eight games, another record.

Notes: Before Varsity defeated X-Men 20-14 in last year's Atlantic Bowl, St. F.X. had won 33 league and playoff games in a row dating back to 1959. Their overall record is 51-3 since 1958. . . . St. Francis' 90-0 win over Stadacona this season set a league record. . . . The biggest single representation on the St. F.X. team is from Ontario with Cornwall, Alexandria, Newmarket, Riverside, Sudbury, Windsor and Ottawa represented.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Irish and Dents in Mullock semi-finals

By AL SCHOENBORN

St. Michael's College and Dentistry advanced to the Mullock Cup semi-finals on the strength of lopsided wins over outclassed squads from Medicine and Trinity.

The Double Blue from St. Mike's pounded out a resounding 39-0 triumph over Trinity, coasting home on a 27-0 half-time margin.

John Govan led the parade for Irish with a pair of majors, while single touchdowns went to Paul Dedumets Tony Fiorini, Vern McCreary, and Rick Agro. Bill Meagher added three converts for the winners.

Dentistry also shut out its opposition, Medicine. 27-0 Dents scored one touchdown per quarter.

Brad Holmes went over twice for the toothpullers, while Paul Morgan scored a major and clicked on three converts. The other major went to Jack Zosky.

In winning, St. Mike's earned the right to meet Pharmacy in one semi-final, to be played at Varsity Stadium, Friday at 2 p.m.

Dentistry will take on a favored Vic squad, Thursday at 12 p.m.

SOCCER

Sr. SPS shut out St. Mike's A 3-0, Monday, to go undefeated to the Group I title. In losing, the Double Blue fell one point short of the fourth and final playoff spot which now goes to Trinity A.

In other action, a pair of goals from Paul Schuller paced Vic I to 4-2 decision over PHE.

With the regular schedule completed, the playoffs are now in the offing.

As Division II play is completed, Architecture have found out an undefeated record is not always an assurance of a first-place finish.

The Architects were held to a 1-1 draw by a fighting Pharmacy team, and thus fell into second place a point behind Law which was also undefeated.

Knox College sneaked into the third and last playoff spot in Division II after a 1-0 win over Forestry, while Pharmacy played to another tie, 1-1 against Wycliffe.

The second and third-place finishers from Division II will now play off on Thurs. Nov. 21 at 3 p.m. for the right to meet Law in the final.

HOCKEY

The Irish from St. Mike's gave last year's finalists, Sr. SPS a rough baptism in interfac play with a 4-0 drugging.

Kevin Burkett, John Mastromatteo, Mike Riddell and Jim Conway were the St. Mike's marksmen.

Vic II edged Trinity A, down Group I this year, 3-2. Vic goals were scored by Greer, Davidson and Watson while Bates and Kennedy replied for Trinity.

Goals by Tony DiCorpo and Bill Payne gave UC II a 2-0 win over Trinity B in Group III, while Group IV action saw Law A edge Forestry A 2-1.

In intermediate hockey, it was Vic III and SPS I in a 1-1 tie, St. Mike's C over UC III 6-2, Dents B over Meds B

3-2 and Pharmacy B over Forestry B 2-0.

RUGGER

The added power of Gerry Sternberg of Blues football fame was not enough to keep UC from losing its sixth game in Group I rugger, as the Redmen lost 13-11 to Trinity A.

Mike Gray led the Red and Black with a pair of tries John O'Brien added two converts. Sternberg was a stand-out with two tries for UC.

Law took first place in Division I.

Varsity Blues place five on Coaches' All-Star Team

Golden Gaels show strength with 10 all-stars, Connor, Young, Feidler unanimous selections

By RICK KOLLINS
Varsity Sports Editor

The strength of Queen's Golden Gaels in the Senior Intercollegiate Football League was reflected by the results of the third annual coaches all-star poll, released today. Gaels, who went undefeated in league play to the Yates Cup, placed 10 players on the Coaches' All-Star Team.

Western Mustangs, second-place finishers, had six players selected to the "dream team", Varsity Blues placed five and McGill Redmen four. In all, 25 players were chosen to fill 24 positions since a tie resulted for the final offensive halfback spot between Bill Edwards of Queen's and Gerry Sternberg of Toronto.

Queen's quarterback Cal Connor and fullback Jimmy Young led the Gael contingent by gaining unanimous support from the coaches. Connor returns to the all-star team after a year's absence while Young was selected for the second time in succession.

The only other unanimous choice was tackle Dick Feidler of McGill Redmen, also the incumbent on the offensive line. Feidler, however, did not repeat as an all-star at defensive tackle, where he was also selected in 1962.

Gaels' strength on the team was confined mainly to the offence, where they placed eight players, points, based on nine first-place votes.

Only two Gaels were chosen to the defensive squad. Four of Queen's regular offensive backfielders made the team, halfbacks Bayne Norrie and Edwards, Young and Connor.

McGill's Willie Lambert, the league scoring champion, won a halfback berth for the third year in a row and the final spot went to Sternberg by virtue of a tie with Edwards. Sternberg, who played both offence and defence this season, was the fourth highest scorer in the league with six touchdowns.

Gaels contributed four offensive linemen, guards John Erickson and Bill Miklas, tackle Don Rasmussen and end Pete Thompson. It was the third time in as many years that Erickson has gained all-star recognition. Centre John Metras Jr. of Western, who was on the 1961 squad, and end Pat McConnell round out the offence.

McConnell, runner-up to Lambert for league scoring honors with 58 points, was the only rookie selected to the squad and missed unanimous selection by only two points.

Western and Varsity each placed four players on the defensive team, Queen's and McGill two each. End Al McKenzie of McGill was the only player returned to the defensive 12 from 1962 as he gained recognition for the third year in a row.

Middle guard Dave McCullough, linebackers Ray German and Bill Watters and halfback Ken Davison were chosen from Varsity. Tackle Jack Cowin, end Barry Mitchelson, linebacker George Chris and halfback Jim Weber were the Mustang defenders. Tackle Jim Greenwood and halfback Bob Latham were selected from Queen's. Linebacker John Costaregni was the final Redman.

Although McConnell was the only freshman selected to the team, German, Chris and Costaregni were playing their first seasons in the senior circuit after seeing action with other colleges.

Besides Feidler and Lambert, who was also selected on both offence and defence in 1962, three other players still eligible were not returned from the previous year. Brent Mundy of Western lost his guard position, Merv Daub of Queen's was replaced at middle guard and perennial all-star Don Taylor was ousted at end. Daub's and Taylor's chances were hindered because they played more than one position during the season.

The all-star team is selected by the four coaching staffs in the league with each staff returning three ballots or the weighted equivalent. Points are awarded on a 5-3-1 basis for first, second, and third choices and with coaches not allowed to vote for their own players a perfect score is 45

MARCH FOR CANADA RAIN OR SHINE 12 NOON TODAY

THE varsity

VOL. 83 — NO. 25 — NOV. 22nd, 1963

March for Canada

BACKGROUND

An ad hoc committee of students working last week in connection with the Canadian/Canadian committee of the SAC has prepared the following brief for presentation to Premier John Robarts today at noon:

Whereas: We the students of the University of Toronto are deeply concerned with the future of Canada, particularly at this critical point in our history, and;

Whereas: We recognize the importance of the existence of "le fait Canadien français" in Canada today as the Canadian Union of Students already has done;

"We hope that: The Ontario government in the coming Federal-Provincial Conference, firstly will think of the welfare of Canada and, secondly, will maintain an understanding and flexible attitude towards the problems which will confront the conference."

DEVELOPMENTS

Premier John Robarts will meet the students when they present the brief between noon and 1 p.m. today. The previous 1 p.m. date had to be changed due to a time conflict with the funeral service for Mayor Donald Summerville.

The student council of York University has announced its support of the march. A contingent from York will be present today.

Richard Pope (IV UC), chairman of the Canadian/Canadian committee, stressed the need for dignity in today's march.

"We have a great opportunity to affect public opinion favorably if the march is orderly and serious in tone," he said.

TODAY

Today's March for Canada program will begin at the flagpole behind the SAC building at noon.

At 12:10 p.m. the band will play O Canada. Then Doug Ward, president of the SAC, will address the students on the purpose and procedure of the march.

At 12:20 p.m. the students will march to Queen's Park. The brief will be presented to Premier Robarts by 12:30 p.m.

Premier Robarts will then address the students. Following his statement the band will play O Canada a second time.

At 12:45 p.m. the students will march back to the campus.

March "can be successful"

Professor Paul Fox of the University of Toronto political economy department said Wednesday that today's march on Queen's Park "can be particularly successful."

Prof. Fox was addressing more than 300 students who had gathered to learn more about the March for Canada.

He outlined the background to the Federal-Provincial conference that starts Monday in Ottawa.

Prof. Fox stated that essentially it is a problem of who is to get tax revenues. Quebec wants a large share of this revenue to develop her resources and industries.

Premier W.A.C. Bennett of British Columbia has announced that he will demand everything Quebec asks for.

"However," Prof. Fox said, "the federal treasury can't stand having two big provinces make such demands. It would just fold."

He also said that if something is not done now, this economic problem in Quebec could turn into a "purely emotional thing" as happened in Cuba.

Mr. Robarts has not made public his intentions. Thus, the purpose of the brief is to express students' concern that he act wisely.

Prof. Fox stated that he welcomed the wording of the brief. "I like the conciliatory way it was approached because this is the way the whole problem of Canadianism must be approached," he said.

"I am convinced that unless we are ready to accommodate the moderate demands of Quebec now, it is likely that those moderates in power will be pushed aside by the more radical."

Stuart Goodings, past president of NFCUS termed the march an "affirmation of student belief in the current and important problems affecting Canada."

Just as English Canada does not want to be assimilated by the United States, so the French-Canadians want to remain distinct from the rest of Canada, he said.

Robarts deftly sidesteps Quebec issue on eve of Federal-Provincial Conference

Premier John Robarts last night evaded answering an appeal to take up the opportunity of meeting the challenge of Quebec.

Vince Kelly, New Democratic Party candidate for Armourdale in the last provincial election, told the Hart House debate that because the Quebecois can see no move in Ontario to preserve the Canadian cultural identity, there is a crisis in Confederation.

During Premier Robarts's half-hour speech he explained his party's philosophy and reviewed its record while in office. The premier did not mention the coming Federal-Provincial Conference or the French-Canadian situation.

Speaking for the Noes from the floor, Mr. Kelly said Quebec is facing the same economic problems Ontario once faced.

The result in Ontario was the influx of United States capital and control, and the flight of the educated youth to higher paying jobs in the United States.

But in Quebec the French-speaking youth remained in the province and when "Premier Jean Lesage uncorked the revolution the energies of the youth were released," Mr.

Kelly said.

"Part of the power of the Quebec revolution is the ferment of the province's educated youth," he continued.

Massey to get bar?

The University of Toronto may soon get its first legal bar.

In a statement yesterday the Liquor Licensing Board said that it has no objection to granting a club licence to Massey College.

The board's decision on whether or not the licence will be granted will be announced soon.

A club licence permits the sale of all types of alcoholic beverages whether they are served with meals or not.

Leaders to debate

The first of a two-week series of debates between campus parties running in the model parliament elections will discuss Biculturalism
Monday at 4 p.m. in the Junior Common Room of University College.

The debates, which plan to touch on nearly every topic of current interest in Canadian politics, will be an hour long each, and will be at either 1 p.m. or 4 p.m. Parties have agreed not to restrain their views on some issues which may be at variance with their national party.

All party leaders have agreed to submit themselves to public questioning at a "grand inquiry" in Convocation Hall Dec. 4. As another democratic feature, police will also be in attendance.

The debates will be held at various campus locations and times and dates will appear in The Varsity.

Feature 3 choirs at concert

The Tri-University Concert is appearing again for the 12th straight year at Hart

It features the Hart House Glee Club, that has sung at universities and throughout

Broadway, hymns and college medleys. It recently won the highest award in the United States for versatility and musical quality.

The Royal Military College
Glee Club is one of the top

Ontario. The club has also made several long-play recordings. The latest is called An Evening with the Hart House Glee Club.

The University of Rochester
Men's Glee Club and the Royal Military College Glee Club also will sing.

The Rochester group features music from Bach to singing groups in the country

This is its third appearance at the University.

This Saturday night each club will present a varied selection of spirituals, madrigals and college songs.

Tickets are available at the Hall Porter's desk in Hart House. Women can obtain their tickets in the main hall just inside the front door.

Santa's on campus

With elves and jingle bells and a loud "Ho ho ho...
Eh?" Santa Claus arrived on the University of Toronto
campus Wednesday.

About 300 engineers, many dressed in colorful clown costumes, carried Santa from lunchroom to lunchroom, led by the Skule flag and the Lady Godiva Memorial Band.

The parade set off across front campus at 1 p.m. and visited University College, Trinity, Victoria College and St. Mike's.

Finally Santa returned to the Engineering Stores where he will appear for the rest of the week.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Chess tournament

Radio transmitters will be humming around Hart House this Sunday as this university's first international chess competition in several years gets under way.

The Hart House Chess Club has challenged Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio.

Six games will be going on simultaneously in the Committees Room at Hart House.

All information on players' moves will be relayed from the ham shack at the north side of Hart House where the main transmitter is located to the Committees Room, where a receiver will transfer the messages.

Moves will be recorded on both ends by means of a prearranged system of board and move numbers.

Charge 4 U of A profs

A charge of unlawful assembly laid against four University of Alberta staff members Monday—the first such charge since the passage of the Bill of Rights — has put the four on bail of $1,000 each.

The four men tried to read a statement during the first council meeting since the bitter October civic elections.

They called for the resignation of the re-elected mayor on the grounds he was unfit to hold public office.

Mayor Hawrelak resigned in 1959 after a judicial inquiry accused him of "gross misconduct" in land deals.

A tired production of a tired chesnut

By BOB DINSMORE

The 1963 production of St. Michael's College "Mickities", playing now in the auditorium O.C.E., is an old standard, particularly suited to the enthusiasms and talents of amateur college song-and-dance performers.

The Boy Friend is just as corny, cliched, and implausible as ever, and this production, while never seriously at fault, adds little in the way of originality.

The plot itself is too standardized to require much description. Rich boy runs away from family, meets and sings a love-duet with the over-protected rich girl (pretending to be poor), girl's friends sing, dance and generally have a good frolic with various suitors, girl's father meets old flame, rich boy is discovered by parents, everyone gets married. And every opportunity is taken to get as many people as possible singing about the various shallow reflections on love among the wealthy flapper set on the Riviera of the 20s. Such a piece of entertainment is based in a simple conception of type characters who need only look good, dance or shuffle a little, and belt out roaring twentieth century lyrics about the Charleston, etc.

And such typical doings require, unfortunately, more than typical performers to make the whole thing successful. The proper use of the cliché is a fine art.

St. Mike's has a reasonable number of more than typical performers in this production. The two leads were, no doubt, chosen for their singing rather than their acting abilities, and while Joanne O'Meara and Gene Valerioté pleased the audience in their duets, it was the more polished abilities in the field of comic posturing, gesturing and moving, of Barbara Jean Friend as Mme. Dubonnet (headmistress of the finishing school in Nice), Cathy Chilco (Maisie, naturally), Lady Cygan (Dulcie), and Joseph Torbay (Lord Brockhurst), that consistently added life and enjoyment to the ensemble scenes.

The opening number, Perfect Young Ladies, made up for the rather disorganized overture, and Safety in Numbers by the French suitors in Act II, and It's ever Too Late by Dulcie and Brockhurst in Act III, were very well done.

Choreography was perhaps a little too athletic, but with a rah-rah show of this kind, suitable if not successful. Colorful and simple sets added to the general brightness, and by the second act the orchestra had warmed up enough to keep pace with the action.

The Boy Friend falls in love again tonight and tomorrow night at 371 Bloor St. W.

Expect JFK to get degree

President John F. Kennedy is expected to receive an honorary degree from the Faculty of Law early next year, university officials said last night.

Mr. Kennedy replied to an invitation from the faculty several weeks ago, saying he hoped to be able to receive the degree when in Toronto. University officials said a special convocation would be called for whatever date the president sets.

The degree to be conferred would be one of honorary Doctor of Laws, LL.D. or Doctor Laws honoris causa.

ation to retain their cultural identity, the French-Canadians must control their economic identity, Mr. Kelly said.

Taking the example of the pension plans, Mr. Kelly said the private plans only put money in the hands of the U.S. owned insurance companies. But Quebec has gradually taken control of the insurance companies and directed the monies of the development of secondary industries, Mr. Kelly claimed.

He concluded with a "non-partisan appeal to our premier to meet the thrust from the Quebecois."

The premier later declined to comment on the stand he would take at the Federal-Provincial conference if Premier Lesage asked special fiscal concessions for Quebec.

"Nobody can forecast what will come up," he said. "We are going in a spirit of co-operation and I am quite certain we can solve the problem."

In answering the speakers for the Noes, J. F. Brewin (III Law) and J. F. Godfrey (III Trin), Premier Robarts denied the Progressive Conservative Party opposes change.

"We espouse change based upon that which has been proven," he said. "We only change when the change better a condition or rights, a wrong."

While reviewing the Tory governments record the premier said that in 1963, 16 Ontario universities received $70,000,000 in grants. David Lloyd-Jones (II Trin) interrupted from the floor, asking how many more universities there would be by 1970.

"Probably not many, but the ones we have will be a lot larger," Premier Robarts replied.

Taking the Medicare issue as a Conservative example of concern and caution, Brewin maintained that the Ontario government has been more concerned with "the poor insurance companies" and the interests of doctors than getting the job done.

Jeff Lyons (III Law) and Richard Tan (III Meds) spoke for the Ayes, both defending the resolution (Conservatism is the logical policy for Ontario's needs) on the basis of the government's record and interest in the individual.

The motion was carried by a 71 to 59 vote.

Today at noon an unknown number of students will meet beneath the flag behind the Students' Administrative Council building to march on Queen's Park.

The gathering of students will indicate a genuine concern for Canada; a concern deep enough to draw these students from their lectures, labs, lunch hours and leisure activities.

The significance of the March For Canada has, in part, already been realized. Wednesday more than 300 students attended a meeting to hear an explanation of the critical situation which will face 10 premiers and the prime minister next week.

The significance of the march has been recognized all this week in Quebec. News of plans have received much play in the Quebec press; and many French-Canadian student leaders have sent telegrams and letters of support. Their reaction has been one of happy amazement as they hear of the English-Canadian student body finally coming to life.

Yesterday even the Toronto press realized that something is happening on this campus.

The question which now remains is: How many students at this university realize the importance of what will happen today when the brief is presented at Queen's Park?

How many will realize that the eyes of the people of Quebec will be watching the march with mixed feelings of hope and skepticism?

How many will realize that the students of the University of Toronto are students of the only university in Canada which is in a position to help close the breach between French and English Canada?

And finally, how many of the students who realize these things will also realize the need for their participation in today's march?

Events have not made the time of the march convenient. The funeral service for Mayor Donald Summerville necessitated advancing the demonstration one hour.

It was suggested that the university administration be approached to have lectures and labs cancelled from noon to 1 p.m. This idea was rejected by the students because the university comes partially under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. It was felt that the cancelling of lectures could be construed as an official endorsement of the march, which in turn might have political repercussions.

But the time change does not necessarily mean that students should not miss a lecture or lab to attend the march. Several professors have indicated their willingness to have students miss lectures in favor of marching. Many others have often pointed out that regular attendance of lectures is not that imperative in any case.

Most students miss several lectures a year as it is. There could be few reasons so important as the one we are now asking students to consider in favor of a lecture or lab.

We recognize the possibility that in missing a lecture or lab students may have to make up for the lost time. But we also know that anything worthwhile is worth working for; and we consider the future of this country worth the amount of work involved in catching up on one lecture.

The future of Canada lies in the hands of the youth of Canada. The youth represented on this campus today has an opportunity to shape in a small way the country it will soon inherit. We hope advantage is taken of the opportunity.

By PETER ACKER

Professor Gilbert Bagnani spends his time in the central tower of University College, two floors and 50 steps above the mob. Subdued light from large stained glass windows fills the small rotunda that leads to his office. Opposite his door, across a skylight is the Gargoyle office, and next to it the locked door to the spiral staircase that leads to the tower lookout.

Professor Bagnani sat in the south-east corner of his office between two windows that look down on the busy front campus and on University Avenue. It's quiet.

"The sound of trampling elephants is not conducive to meditation."

Archaeologist, farmer, country gentleman, and enough of an art specialist to have amassed a valuable personal collection and be on the Canadian Purchase Committee of the Art Gallery, the title of professor is a recent one.

"I didn't start teaching until 1945. Professor Cochran, head of the classics department took seriously ill and I was called in from the farm to fill in on a purely temporary basis. Professor Cochran died and here I am," Prof. Bagnani said.

"You were summoned from your farm sir?"

"Yes, I've got 200 acres in Port Hope and a country house that I consider my home."

I found out Prof Bagnani raises cattle.

"I'm certainly more worried about having my stock rustled than my car stolen."

Prof. Bagnani has seen and gone through the change from truck or "existence" farming to the raising of cash crops. In Greece, he explained, the transition was made to olives and wine grapes.

"Wine grapes need poor soil: The Niagara Peninsula has rich soil and well, their grapes make good eating."

"I've always preferred the country to the city; I spent nearly seven years in the desert."

"In the desert, sir?"

"Yes, you see I was excavating for the Italian government in Egypt. Every country had its finger in the pie — keeping up with the Joneses."

He went on to relate how by 1937 things got too tight for him. His political opinions were making it impossible to continue his career and he thought he would leave before he was tailed to the border by police.

"It was all very nice," He grinned. "They were glad to see me go; I didn't fit in."

Neither did his grandfather. A Scot, he inherited a small legacy, and instead of setting himself up in practice in Edinburgh (he had just graduated from medical school) he blew the whole works in Paris in six months.

"He couldn't go back to Scotland so he came out to Port Hope where he met my grandmother, an extraordinarily beautiful woman. I must say that the taste has continued to run in the family. Their daughter, my mother, was very musically talented and was sent to Germany to study. She visited Italy where she met and married my father."

Professor Bagnani went to school in London while his father was stationed there. He took his degree (D. Litt) in Rome and married a Canadian who was making the same sort of pilgrimage to Italy that his mother had made years before.

Prof. Bagnani has studied, worked and travelled in many countries and an example of the experience with other cultures that he brings to the classroom comes to mind.

He was asked if there was mixed dancing among the lower classes in ancient Greece.

"The only mixing was a bit of doe see doe. It's like the difference between the Hollywood and the real versions of belly dancing."

Prof. Bagnani is an expert on Petronius and has amassed one of the most important collections of Petronius material in the world.

I said I had never heard of Petronius and we were interrupted by a lady who wanted to consult Professor Bagnani on his experience in hunting rare manuscripts and books.

We left his room, crossed to the Gargoyle side of the tower and looked down over the UC quadrangle at the new wing.

"It's going to be nice down there," I said, pointing to the large, rectangular excavation that will become gardens and walks.

Emperor Bagnani grinned. "I was hoping for a swimming pool," he said.

Letters on the March for Canada

The March on Queen's Park this Friday has the full support of the Student Christian Movement in the University of Toronto. The matter of federal-provincial affairs was brought up at our dominion conference at Bala this September and will be the subject of our Central Region conference in Montreal this Christmas.

Yours truly,
G. A. D. Scott,
President.

We heartily support you for your march on November twenty-second. Hand in hand we shall build a strong country. We have only begun to accept our responsibilities as students. We can expect great things for your country. Let us continue to work in the same spirit of co-oper-

A guide to local politics

By PETER SILCOX

Metropolitan Toronto has a two tier system of local government. At the lower level thirteen municipal councils deal with what we might call the housekeeping problems of the area municipalities. The Metropolitan Council, composed of half of the members of the City Council plus the heads of the other twelve area municipalities deals with matters of metropolitan wide significance.

All the politicians discussed below with the exception of Controller Dennison sit on councils at both levels.

The difference between controllers and Aldermen or Councillors is that they are elected on a city-wide vote rather than as representatives of a special area. They are almost full-time politicians and have more duties than Aldermen especially with reference to finance matters.

The 'Dean' of local politicians in the Toronto area is Controller Allan Lamport. A former Liberal member of the Provincial Legislature, Mayor of Toronto and chairman of the Toronto Transportation Commission, he was elected a controller in 1962 after being defeated in the mayoralty race by Nathan Phillips two years earlier.

A survivor of many major rows, a libel suit and a couple of teapot scandals, he surely qualifies as the biggest city booster of them all. A master of local election tactics, he believes that to succeed in the anarchic field of local politics, a candidate must court support from a wide variety of organized groups and sections. As a result practically any group asking something from city council can expect his loudly-voiced support. Consistency is not his strong point and he has shown little talent for administration or long term planning.

William Allen succeeded Frederick G. Gardiner as chairman of the Metropolitan Council. A former city controller, he was elected because the city members wanted the job for one of their number, and Donald Summerville didn't want it.

Following Gardiner was bound to be a difficult task, especially as the members of the Metropolitan Council were determined not to allow a future chairman to dominate proceedings as he had done, but Allen's performance has been unimpressive. Despite the uncertainty surrounding the future of the system of government, it is hard to believe that a firm leadership could not have achieved more.

In the past two years the council has not begun one new major project or got down to seeking constructive solutions to the housing, transportation and planning problems of the metropolis.

Allen, a talented architect of compromises and an extremely hard-working public official, has completely failed to marshal his council or public opinion to face up to their problems. His continuance in the position he now holds seems to condemn the Metropolitan Council to a passive role in the future.

Norman Goodhead, the reeve of North York, a municipality of 300,000, ran against Allen for the chairmanship of the Metropolitan Council in 1962. He was elected the reeve of North York by a large majority in the same year. He has recently switched from being a supporter of the system of government as now constituted to advocating drastic changes in the direction of amalgamation.

The Globe and Mail

An ambitious man, he is obviously talented enough to be a major figure in Ontario politics if he can avoid offending large sections of the public by his rather strident manner. He is a good speaker and a much clearer thinker and a better informed man than most of his colleagues. Increasingly he has given up the role of special pleader for the suburbs and taken a wider view of the problems of the metropolis.

Reeve True Davidson of East York, one of the poorest municipalities, is a lady of sharp wit and intelligence. Without peer in local politics in exposing the non-sensical motivation behind the statements of some of her fellow politicians. She is prepared to fight for her point of view in arguments with any or all of her male colleagues. While she has a very sound group of routine municipal business, her eagerness to defend the interests of the citizens of East York appears to prevent her from taking a broad view with reference to many of the special problems of the metropolitan area.

This is especially annoying to the observer since she obviously has the intelligence to play a large part in solving them.

Much of what has been said about Miss Davidson might be repeated about Reeve Albert Campbell of Scarborough. So pressed is he in his own municipality with financial problems that he is usually unsympathetic to ex-

The Mayor

Mayor Donald Summerville, who died so tragically on Tuesday evening, was elected in 1962 after a brilliant victory over the longest serving Mayor in Toronto's history, Nathan Phillips. Born in the city 48 years ago he had a deep and lasting love for it. In many ways he was the personification of the successful Toronto businessman.

The program on which he fought the 1962 election offered no new approach to the metropolis' problems. Like President Kennedy in 1960 Donald Summerville's promise was to follow the old lines of attack with conviction and vigour. He made the old conventional phrase about business-like government into a rallying cry. He used it with real conviction.

His first year in office was full of frustrations. The position of Mayor did not give him the necessary power to expedite matters in the way he had hoped. Toronto has what political scientists call a weak Mayor system, to distinguish it from that in some larger U.S. cities. Mayor Summerville needed to carry his Council with him to insure action and that he was unable to do despite the recent signs of increased public support for more definitive action. He was an impatient man where measures which effected the welfare of Toronto were concerned. This caused him to take on a tremendous amount of work and was probably the major reason for his collapse.

The new Mayor who will be elected by City Council within a short time is most likely to be Philip Givens. He is a 41 year old Toronto lawyer and presently senior Controller. An avowed Liberal, his political stock has risen very quickly in the past two years and it was thought likely that he would soon move into Federal politics. A close associate of Mayor Summerville's, he is unlikely to deviate much from the latter's approach.

TSO does better than usual in performing difficult work

By MICHAEL FOX

This week's TSO concerts featured two works composed within the last three years. The first of these, Time Cycle for Soprano, Improvisation Chamber Ensemble, and Symphony Orchestra, by American composer Lucas Foss, is an extremely fascinating work, no less demanding of the listening audience than of the soprano soloist and the orchestra. Commissioned by the Ford Foundation for soprano Adele Addison, this week's guest artist, Time Cycle was given its premiere in October, 1960, by Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic.

In Time Cycle, Foss sets to music three poems and a prose passage. In between each song, the score calls for a small ensemble improvisation (carefully noted in the program of the TSO, but unfortunately just as carefully omitted).

As mentioned above, Foss' music is most difficult to perform. Mr. Foss has said, "In composition, all becomes 'fate'. Improvisation remains 'chance', 'hazard', corrected by the will." It was this idea that prompted him to combine composition and improvisation. But it may have been just as well for the TSO not to attempt the latter, due to the demands of the former, which were not met in a completely satisfactory manner, either by the orchestra or by Miss Addison.

Miss Addison's voice sounded weak and a bit strained at the beginning, but became clear and strong after the first song (based on "We're Late," by W. H. Auden). In the second movement, A. E. Housman's "When the Bells Justle," the piano, brass, and tympani picked up the pace, and showed a vigour that was lacking earlier. The best movement, however, was the third, a prose passage from the Diaries (January 16) of Kafka set to music.

Time Cycle is a true piece for the twentieth century, when time threatens us, and the sound of a clock is somehow always ominous.

The other contemporary work on the TSO program was Gloria for Soprano, Choir, and Orchestra, by the late French composer, Francis Poulenc. In scope and intent, it provides an interesting contrast to Time Cycle.

In form, this is a modified Mass, without the Kyrie. Poulenc, who was a master at combining sacred text and pleasing, often folk-like modern music, created in Gloria a great work of this kind, which shows the influence of Stravinsky, Kodaly, Vaughan Williams and Britten in various sections.

In this piece, Mr. Susskind kept the entire ensemble in good order, cuing carefully, and keeping strict time. The Mendelssohn Choir showed its greatest depth in the strangely beautiful Dominus Deus, Agnus Dei, which repeated many of the themes of the opening Gloria. Miss Addison often faded out, or was drowned out by the orchestra, and her pianissimo passages seemed to be the result of weakness rather than softness. The ascending orchestral crescendo to the final soprano solo was effective, and recalled the unison music of Gregorian Chant. The peaceful final section of the work was well done.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Serenata Notturna" (Serenade No. 6 in D Major, K. 239). The Mozart work was the best performance of the evening by the orchestra. Serenata Notturna features a quartet of strings (including bass), backed up only by some of the strings, and tympani. The orchestra reflected excellently the shades of lightness, pomp, and vitality that are all in this short, balanced composition. Special praise must go to Concert Master Hyman Goodman and tympanist Thomas Burry, for superb individual performance in this work.

Also on the program was Two Nocturnes (Nuages et Fêtes) by Debussy. Nuages was played statically, and had nothing cloudlike about it. But Fêtes, due to some fine brass and wood-wind playing, was thoroughly enjoyable.

Musical Club holds rewarding, tiresome concert

by DAVID S. BUNDLER

The Women's Musical Club of Toronto continues to present the most rewarding concert programs to be heard anywhere in the city. However, in all honesty I must confess that they conspire against themselves by continuing to meet in Eaton Auditorium. This is a concert hall in which it is impossible to produce a clean piano sound, nor a genuine weight of instrumental texture. Add to this the intolerable heat of the place, and you have all the elements of a tiresome concert. Even in my own experience, playing Swan Lake in the place with a high school orchestra, the odds are simply overwhelming.

But still, as far as we can tell, the quality is high. This week the Beaux Arts Trio of New York played Mozart, Brahms and Schubert with great skill and vitality. I felt that the tempo for the first movement of the Schubert B flat Trio was inordinately fast and lacking in flexibility, but the last three movements were entirely musical, and the total effect, satisfactory.

Showstoppers from O'Keefe

by VOLKMAR RICHTER

A new album called Showstoppers from O'Keefe Centre (Capitol) 6048 Mono. and stereo) should be of considerable interest to theatre-goers and music fans alike.

It features hit tunes from some of the more important musicals to play the O'Keefe in the last three years. It includes such notable pieces as If Ever I Would Leave You (Camelot), A Lot of Livin' To Do (Bye Bye Birdie), and I Could Have Danced All Night (My Fair Lady).

The thirty musicians led by Dr. William McCauley are in fine form and often sound as if they were a group twice their size.

This is the week that will be

THEATRE: Red Barn (at Central Library) — The Fantasticks — held over until Jan. 5 — A Thousand Clowns — next week. Black Nativity, an all-negro gospel treatment of Christ's birth.

Q Theatre (St. Luke's Auditorium, Schabourne & Carlton) The Red Eye of Love — a satire on sex by Arnold Weinstein.

Crest — Of Mice and Men (Fri., Sat.) Born Yesterday (Mon., Tues.) June and the Paycock (Wed., Thurs.)

MOVIES: New Yorker — My Life to Live — the old question asked of prostitutes, "How did you get into this business?" is answered.

Loew's — The Whistler Dealers — James Garner is still Maverick but on Wall Street this time.

Towne — Bugs — Fellini's autobiography International — This Sporting Life — a sharp slice of real life.

Loew's Uptown — Lilies of the Field — a fine art movie that doesn't rely on sex or sensationalism.

Downtown etc. — Twice Told Tales — Vincent Price again.

Imperial, Nottown — Palm Springs Weekend — Troy Donohue and Connie Stevens at the famous resort.

Hollywood — In the French style — sex etc. among the international set.

Hyland — Mouse on the Moon — sequel to the Mouse that Roared but without Peter Sellers.

Sovoy etc. — McLintock — a lusty bawling, hilarious western starring John Wayne.

Trioli — An Evening with the Royal Ballet — starring Nureyev and Fonteyn.

Carlton — Under the Yum Yum Tree — yum-yum in this case is pretty awful.

Cloopatra (University), How the West Was Won (Epitome) Lawrence of Arabia (Fairview).

ART: Isaac Gallery — new paintings by Joyce Wieland.

Pollock Gallery — Arnold Rockman — paintings.

Roberts Gallery — paintings by Albert Frank.

Hart House — Recent Campus Architecture from Nov. 24.

MUSIC: Massey Hall — Nov. 22 — Joan Sutherland (sold out).

Nov. 23 — TSO with music from the Ukraine.

Nov. 24-7 — TSO with pianist Ronald Turini.

Edward Johnson Building — Nov. 28 — Shirley Verrett — mezzo soprano.

The Establishment — John Lee Hooker until Sun.

Don't look for snake charmers in India

By TASNEEM A KHAN

Most Westerners who have visited India and Pakistan seem to have made some mistake in their travel arrangements. For, from their accounts of their travels, it seems they may have made the same error as Columbus and, having arrived at Timbuctoo or Ruandi Urundi, mistaken it for India. So we have decided to supply a guide for any potential travellers so that they don't miss anything.

First, to make sure you arrive at the right destination, go to a reputable airline like Pakistan International especially since the pilot is Pakistani and must get home somehow.

Our next advice is on packing. You can unpack that rope you are taking for the rope trick. In India good ropes are easily obtainable. Also, that sponge mattress you are taking to use on the proverbial bed of nails won't be necessary. Fashions change and the nail motif in Indian beds is definitely on the way out. We will let you keep the beads you are taking to barter with the natives. Beads went out when money was introduced in India in 4,000 B.C but we don't want to disillusion you and make India look like Toronto.

There are two clubs in India, 'The Eaters' and 'The Not-Eaters' and everyone belongs to one or the other. Though the Not-Eaters club has many million members, we will advise you to join the smaller Eaters club. It is more fashionable and the rules of membership are not too stringent. One must simply be able to afford to eat well.

Your next problem is going to be our traffic. Pakistanis and Indians are highly individualistic and artistic by nature, so if you see people driving both on the left and right of the road in the style of Stirling Moss, it should be considered a mode of artistic self-expression.

If you want to cross a street, you have a good 50 per cent chance of getting to the other side which is, we are told, two per cent higher than for Montreal.

Shopping is the national pastime and will give you hours of pleasure if you stick to the correct etiquette. When you enter a shop, put on the appearance of someone visiting an old relative.

Exchange small talk with the shopkeeper and accept after three refusals, the cold drink he offers you. Only then should you broach the subject of a purchase. You may try to bring the price down but do it tactfully and do not laugh if he assures you that he is selling at a loss to please you. It is a mere formal statement which neither he nor you are supposed to believe.

You are bound to be inundated with invitations to all sorts of things. Here are some rules of etiquette that should be noted. Arrive at least half an hour late. Pakistanis believe they are not clockwork mechanisms and that there is plenty of time in life for everything.

Whenever you are offered something, the custom is to refuse three times and then accept. If however, you are afraid your host will stop before the three times are complete, then keep a firm hold of the plate he is offering you while you refuse it.

There are two things you must not miss in Pakistan. One is a Wedding (the ceremony has been known to last a month) the other is a 'Mushaira' which is an all night poetry reading session where the top poets of Pakistan read their verses.

You will see sometimes 20,000 people in the audience, from bus-conductors to intellectuals, their enthusiasm rivaling a Canadian crowd at a football match, vociferous in their praise and biting in their comments on mediocrity.

If you hope for amorous adventures you must learn the language of the eyes. The use of words on such occasions is considered a lack of sophistication. Men should learn to read the 'Yes', the 'Perhaps' and the 'Definitely Not' look. Women tourists should practice these three basic looks for several hours before a good mirror to acquire perfection.

If you are not sure about producing the right eye expression we advise using language, for if you mean 'No' and it is taken for 'Yes' it might be a bore and if you mean 'Yes' and its thought to be 'No' you will be disappointed.

Having thus equipped you for travel we wish you Bon Voyage. If you still come back with stories of snake charmers and Maharajahs they you are wasting your time in the U of T. Try the movie business in Hollywood.

Hitler did not have the answer

By PAUL COREY

I have been asked on occasion whether eugenics is part of human genetics or whether human genetics is part of eugenics.

Human genetics is the experimental science which is unravelling the mysteries of the gene. To the general public human genetics is rather uninteresting since as any specialized science it must talk with a very specialized jargon.

Eugenics, however, offers a fascinating field to those who feel that they want to help mankind. It appeals to those practical minds who want to go directly to the applied science without sufficient understanding of the pure science. It also appeals to the fanatics who want ready-made scientific formulas to serve their own ends.

In fact the early emphasis in human genetics on eugenics displays a very dangerous trend that often follows the dawn of an idea. The trend is simply an unjustified enthusiasm concerning a new idea. It starts in science and ends in this case with the massacre of a few million Jews — which is not science. It leaves the experimental science which originally gave flower to the idea far behind in murky laboratories attempting to reveal the true truth.

Where did this all begin? In 1859 Darwin published observations which he neatly put together into a whole new theory. In the Origin of Species he explained how certain species, such as man, could have come about due predominantly to the force of natural selection. Thus species which were ill-adapted to their environment were eliminated by that environment. It is quite a simple concept but unfortunately such phrases as "survival of the fittest" were misinterpreted as "survival of the strongest." Many examples can be shown in nature where the fittest is not the strongest.

In fact the beautiful cooperation between two organisms known as symbiosis has been completely forgotten by those who want to convince others that weakness is a sin and murder, war and destruction are good because then the strong will survive, the weak die, and this is natural.

The next advance came in 1865 when Mendel showed that inherited traits were transmitted by distinct entities which we now call genes. Darwin himself believed that inheritance was transmitted through the blood. With Darwin's theory of selection and Mendel's theory of the gene a scientific method of selection was put into the hands of man. Could not man eliminate "bad" genes from a human population to get a "pure" race or variety just as Mendel did with peas? It sounded good but mathematical theory was necessary to show that it was not practical.

For example let us look at the mental disease phenylketonuria. It was thought that this trait was determined by a "recessive" gene. This disease is very rare and in Britain, for example, six people out of every 100,000 suffer from it. Now if it were hoped that this trait could be eliminated it may be of interest to point out that if all phenylketonuric idiots were killed at birth it would take about 400, 000 years to reduce the frequency of the disease by one half. Now unfortunately many of the hereditary diseases in the human population are determined by rare recessive genes.

Thus although any particular disease is rare together they make up a large proportion of the population. Yet it is foolish to attempt in any short span of time to eliminate them by complete selection against the aberrant offspring.

I think that there is a better approach worthy of consideration. To take an example the abnormality galactosaemia is determined by a rare recessive gene. Children suffering from it display severe mental and physical retardation and often die in infancy. Now the methods of human genetics such as analysis of family pedigrees indicate that it is a hereditary disease. By this one simply means that the disease is more common in certain families than in the rest of the population. Thus rather than try to eliminate such a gene from the population it perhaps would be better to look for some underlying factor which is common to the families but which is not common to the general population. It has been found that galactosaemic children cannot metabolize the sugar galactose properly and when fed in infancy on a galactose-free diet they thrive successfully. Moreover it is found that after a few years the child can safely use galactose. He no longer needs a special diet. Thus by helping him over a difficult period he ultimately will be normal.

This is how I think that human genetics should be used to better man. By investigating the physical basis of hereditary disorders new cures and new techniques can be developed to relieve man of his suffering. This to me is a much nobler plan than the old ideals of the eugenicists which culminated in the breeding program of that king of all eugenicists — Adolf Hitler.

What unspeakable horror, gnashing white fangs, stalks residence halls and ponders ripping out throats under a full moon?

What incredibly loathsome werewolfian beast endangers males and coeds in its search for the joys of slaughter?

More important, how can students recognize such a nameless terror by day?

Approach and gaze. Sitting at any campus dining table. There's one now — a male.

He looks like an ordinary Artsman — frustrated, oppressed, underfed. But watch him.

A plate with a pork chop, apple sauce, potatoes and corn is put before him. He turns ashen. Beads of perspiration appear on his now-wrinkled forehead. His eyes blaze with fury and he muffles with difficulty a bestial snort.

Swiftly he trims the fat and bone from his chop and brushes them, along with the applesauce, to a sideplate. He breathes more easily.

Then he pushes meat, potatoes and corn to opposing sectors of the plate. His complexion resumes its innocent freshman pink.

NEAR THE BRINK

What weird transformation has passed over him? For a few seconds he was on the threshold of a shadowy world inhabited by vampires and lust-murderers.

That student has the dreaded . . . (my fingers fear to type the words):

Syndrome indicative of repressed oral aggression.

He sits revealed for what he is, a potential descendant of Count Dracula of Transylvania.

Food phobias such as our composite freshman displays are a significant part of the syndrome — or set of concurrent symptoms — connected with a defence reaction against an extremely strong oral-sadistic drive.

The game Spot The Nut can be all kinds of keen fun at dinner. Here's what to watch for:

Some people dislike eating any meat served in a form that reminds them of any part of the original animal. They experience horror and anxiety, says S. S. Feldman in an essay in The Yearbook of Psychoanalysis, Volume 10.

"But if the meat is prepared and served in a compact form like a piece of meat, without reminding them that it was once a living being, they eat it without disgust.

"They dislike to see, let alone eat, meat with visible arteries, veins, ligaments, connective tissue or fat. These have to be removed before the food is eaten, if it is eaten at all.

THE SKIN'S A PROBLEM

"The same persons usually avoid boiled chicken if the skin is yellowish and movable over the flesh . . .

"To the point of disgust, many individuals . . . loathe to have different foods on the same plate." If the food cannot be had on separate plates, the eaters "carefully separate the food on the same plate." You've all probably seen people do that, quite unconsciously.

"The 'mixed' food makes them feel as if they would eat and swallow a whole animal, once a living being, consisting of solid parts and fluids."

Other facets of this peculiar syndrome include people's reactions to sounds of the bodily functions of animals and humans. Such people would be particularly sensitive to the sound of somebody cracking their knuckles.

"The listener might become so irritated that he might feel compelled to run away," says Feldman, "or feel that otherwise he might 'go crazy or might kill' the person who is doing the cracking."

Similarly, people who are annoyed by the sound of somebody scraping fingernails down a blackboard may well have trouble fighting down the desire "to attack the source of the stimulus even so far as to kill him."

"The impulse to attack, to kill the other person is perceived in the form of a wish to bite, to jump at his throat, to bite it through, to eat him, to drink his blood, to devour him."

If only Dracula's mother had let him take his aggressions out on animal crackers.

MOVIES

What has 12 feet and brings tears to your eyes

By MARIANNA ANGUS

The Incredible Journey, now playing at the Birchcliff, Westwood and Capitol theatres, fits snugly into the "Movie for the Whole Family" Disney tradition. This Canadian version of "Lassie Come Home" is a sure hit for the youngsters and, as is Disney's peculiar knack, it also provides exciting and humorous entertainment for adults.

As usual, the animals take over. This time they're a bull terrier, a Siamese cat and a golden retriever. Their owners, a typical Canadian family, are forced to live in England for a short time and the three pets are entrusted to the care of a friend (Emile Genest). But it isn't long before the animals get lonely and slip away to begin their 200 mile trek home across the Canadian wasteland. The adventures which follow are many and varied but, surprisingly enough, do not impede the progress of the film. With the aid of a few kind humans along the way, the animals overcome their difficulties and arrive home safe and sound.

As in most of Disney's films, the photography is superb. The Canadian scenery is shown off in vivid technicolor and the close-ups of wildlife in general are sensitive and revealing. The musical score is perfectly suited to the antics of the three animals who, incidentally, are well-trained proficient actors in their own right. It is a shame that these creditable aspects of the film should be marred by the laconic drawl of the narrator, whose speech consists of nothing more than a steady stream of clichés. The supporting actors, notably John Drainie, Emile Genest and Beth Lockerbie, handle their roles with professional ease but the children's performances are not as natural or spontaneous as one might have hoped.

On the whole, The Incredible Journey is refreshing entertainment for almost everyone especially animal-lovers.

New boom in prints

By ANNE LINDNER

Amid the mud and concrete of new sewers and new subways two galleries have established themselves in Yorkville Village. Gallery Pascal on Yorkville and Prints International in the Lothian Mews are showing and selling a hitherto secondary and forgotten art form.

They are presenting it as a major form of communication in the art world... one that has only recently made itself felt as an independent and valid medium.

They bring to buyers prints, produced in limited editions by artists, in mediums such as lithograph, etching, engraving, wood-cuts and aquatints as well as monoprints and the occasional drawing.

Prints International, which opened May 16, 1963, presents shows of individual artists working in the print medium. These shows consist mainly of contemporary artists, from a wide range of countries.

Other than this, the shop carries original prints and drawings, post-card reproductions and larger reproductions that the student is well known for buying. The latter seem necessary to pay the rent. That is not to say however that the originals are outrageously priced. An average Canadian would cost from 20 to 50 dollars. Cheap enough to satisfy even supposedly underpaid professors.

Gallery Pascal opened on September 14. It carries the gamut of recent and current print-makers on its walls. Mrs. Pascal or Miss Schwartz will sell a Gary Slipper for $10 or a Picasso lithograph for $300.

Unlike Prints International, the Yorkville shop does not have showings devoted to individual artists. Nor does it sell reproductions. It has a large variety of Canadian, South and Central American, Japanese, and European art which can be easily acquired by the aspiring, but financially limited collector. It has a small stock of older prints and will take orders for them.

The sources that the shops use seem unimpeachable and are usually the artists themselves. Occasionally it is necessary to purchase from agents and catalogues, but if so, only reputable and established dealers are used. So when you buy your Braque or Matisse, it will be a guaranteed non-faked sort of thing.

Both shops were established because new vistas seemed to be opening for the print form and because theoretically, there was a market with no supplier.

Beehive in a millpond

By BEVERLEY SLOPEN

One of the most dynamic and unique departments of the university is located off campus in a residential neighborhood where the sprawling, elegant homes of a former era are slowly being supplanted by modern, high-rise apartments.

The Institute of Child Study, severed from the main flow of the student body, thrives in a former 41-room mansion on Walmer Road. Only a small, fenced-in playground beside the house and a modest sign distinguish it from the other homes in the area.

But the calm, placid exterior masks a hubbub of activity. For, inside, 150 children are at school; research programs are in progress; students from various departments and faculties are attending lectures; and a host of clerical staff are looking after countless administrative details — to say nothing of material being prepared and assembled for publication.

All of this activity is centered around the children; for the purpose of the Institute is the study of normal, mentally well children. Ranging from three to 11 years in age, the pupils attend the nursery and elementary schools at the Institute, providing 'real' children as the research material.

"There are no grades here," explained Mrs. Bolton who showed me around, as we threaded our way through the rooms of the Schools. "The children are grouped according to age, and there are no more than 20 in each class. The emphasis is on the individual. Each child works at his own speed, and there are no awards, standings or competitions. Discipline is relaxed and the atmosphere is quite informal. However, the children are prepared to be assimilated by the public school system when they leave at the end of grade 6."

I asked Mrs. Bolton how they acquired their pupils. She replied, "The parents register them practically at birth! Each year we have a waiting list of over 100. We only require that they should be average, healthy children, although preference is given to twins and siblings."

As we toured the area of the building devoted to the Schools, we were able to observe children in some of the classrooms through a one-way screen. A few of the nursery school children, who are from 3 to 5 years old, were playing in an observation room supervised by one of the students enrolled in the diploma course of Child Study offered by the Institute.

"The children are heedless of strangers watching them," said Miss M. I. Fletcher, principle of the Nursery School. "A few of them are aware of the screen and someone will occasionally rush out of the room, climb up to the screen, quickly peek through, and then run back to join his playmates."

The little ones also remained unabashed by visitors observing their training in personal care. They go about the ritual of scrubbing hands and brushing teeth before miniature wash basins, undisturbed by the presence of strangers.

As the various aspects of the Institute were being explained, it was impossible not to sense the current of enthusiasm which ran through the staff, as well as the cheerfulness and contentment of the children. The success of the Institute is largely attributed to Dr. Blatz, who became Director of the Institute at its inception in 1925 and retained his post until his retirement three years ago.

Often described by his colleagues as a "prophet", Dr. Blatz's theories and visions still continue to determine the course of the Institute today. His theory of security provides the central theme of the different research projects of the staff.

In an interview at his home in a suburb of Toronto, Dr. Blatz, a kindly, gentle man, talked about the Institute and his theory of security.

Children frolic at U of T Institute of Child Study

"Security," explained Dr. Blatz, "is a concept of development in which an individual growing up learns that there are consequences to his actions or decisions. The individual must accept, circumvent, avoid or ignore them. If he accepts the consequences, he is secure. The degree in which he tries to avoid them is the measure of his insecurity. The goal is independent security."

Dr. Blatz related this to particular aspects of child training carried on at the Institute. "For instance, there is no corporal punishment. Children will avoid accepting the consequences of their actions if corporal punishment is threatened. They must be taught to weigh the pros and cons of their decisions."

Expanding this to apply to society at large, he stated, "Politicians and civil servants won't make decisions. Passing the buck is the national pastime."

"There are also no awards. We don't want the children to compete, but to cooperate. The only reward is accomplishment."

Dr. Blatz said public school systems are slowly adopting the Institute's suggestions.

"A few years ago there was scarcely a classroom without a strap. Now, it is falling more and more into disuse. We also begin French as early as the nursery school, and French is just beginning to be taught at an earlier age. There are even some educators who are trying to find a substitute for the report card in order to avoid it as an area of competition. There is no report card at the Institute. The parents trust us. Of course, they can come and visit whenever they please."

Dr. Blatz's retirement leaves him time for reading, writing, and his 2 grandsons. But most of his time is devoted to the preparation of his book on security.

"As yet," he said, "time doesn't hang heavily, but I'd be lying if I said I didn't miss the Institute. Research is one of the most exciting and stimulating fields. For me, it is even more exciting than mountain climbing. It's the adventure of ideas, which can often be as dangerous as mountain climbing. I also miss being with my colleagues. But most of all, I miss the children. In the early days, I used to work with them in the nursery school, and then later, I used to visit very often. I knew them—and they got to know me."

Dr. Blatz also spoke about the diploma course offered at the Institute. A graduate of a recognized university is eligible for the one year course in Child Study.

Because it is the only institute of its kind in Canada, it draws students from various sections of the country. But there is also an international flavour. Seven or eight years ago, a group from Thailand came to study at the Institute and then returned to their own country to establish a similar organization. At present, there are two women from the Philippines and a young woman from Japan studying there.

Perhaps some day the Institute will return to the campus. Only then will it be possible to make a larger portion of the student body aware of this bold experiment which developed into a vital, throbbing organism that not only contributes to the University through research, but also contributes directly to society.

Only personal contact helps communication

By MARY ANN CODE

Ours is an age of rapidly improving mechanical means of communication. But confusion is only increased. The art of lucid, meaningful communication remains relatively undeveloped.

Much of the ideological turmoil in Southeast Asia today results from the lack of effort to communicate effectively.

On the changing world scene, groups of every nationality, social class, religious and cultural background develop and attempt to promulgate social goals and political ideologies to those who will listen and to those who can be persuaded.

It is obvious that some social goals and political ideologies are the same; and others are different. But those that appear similar often differ, while those that appear different often are the same.

Blatant examples of such misunderstandings confront us in the daily news on local, national and international levels.

The mere attempt to improve communications requires understanding, a quality that is only attained with much effort, patience, insight and knowledge.

To begin to comprehend another's point of view, we must hold this basic principle in mind: people act in situations largely according to the patterned meanings and values supplied by the social and cultural groups to which they belong.

The same principle applies to the ideological values, goals and abstract concepts such as democracy, peace and freedom, respectively. I do not deny the importance of a knowledge of the political, economic and historic setting of these people. This is necessary in order to understand the Indian or Taiwanese meaning of these terms (of democracy, peace and freedom) and the meaning they give to any subject of international debate.

But we must include with this a knowledge and awareness of the cultural differences between ours and their groups.

Much of this knowledge and awareness is not to be found on the printed page. To find it, efforts must be made to overcome unsympathetic attacks on another's views and the desire to defend our own prejudices.

Personal contact and the intelligent exchange of responsible views of both citizens and political leaders remains one of the most important roads toward more effective international communication and evaluation of our own ideologies and institutions.

The annual World University Service winter seminar weekend offers Canadian and overseas students an opportunity to mingle in the relaxed winter atmosphere of Caledon Hills Dec. 6-8.

Barbara Ann Stephen, assistant curator of the far eastern department of the Royal Ontario Museum, will speak on "The Political Role of Nationalist China in Asia." Last year she and her husband Doug of the CBC visited Taiwan to shoot a documentary film on the American military installations on the island.

But Mr. Stephen has been called to Lima, Peru, to film an international regatta at the time of the seminar.

Sally Bambridge (SGS), recently returned Canadian Overseas Volunteer in India, and Sam Gupta (SGS) of India will lead a discussion on "Politics, Social Structure, and Cultural Values in India and Canada."

During the discussion students will be given a panoramic view of pertinent aspects of Indian life and will be presented with problems for further consideration.

Overseas students will give Canadian students a critical evaluation of aspects of Canadian life.

Deadline for applications is next Wednesday, Nov. 27, at the SAC office and at Friendly Relations With Overseas Students, 45 Willcox.

Small theatres give students good prices

By TERRY TWEED

Honest Ed may have the Royal Alex but the small theatres are also providing bargains for the winter season. All have reductions on student tickets.

The Questers is a new theatre group that started in September at the Village Playhouse on LaPlante Ave. It is an amateur company headed by Maurice Evans, Mary Morter, Ruth Green and John Burgess. Its aim is to promote new Canadian plays, conduct classes in drama, and to provide a theatrical training ground.

All four Questers feel strongly about the development of Canadian playwrights because to them the play seems the most important feature of any production. They intend to produce original Canadian scripts so that the author may see his work in production, and profit by it.

Mr. Evans thinks there is a need for a non-professional group with high standards which will be more receptive to original Canadian plays than the professional companies in Toronto have shown themselves to be.

"So far the professional companies in Toronto have shown a considerable lack of interest in producing Canadian plays. We plan for instance, to do Lister Sinclair's, The Blood is Strong."

This is only part of their plan. They have also set up a Theatre Club for actors and people who are interested in production work. The Drama School has classes for both adults and children. Prices are modest.

The Questers are an enthusiastic group and their ideas are commendable. Perhaps they aim too high but that remains to be seen. If the plays prove only mediocre, and the acting standard is low, then at best the interest can only be luke-warm. Most audiences do not want to spend an evening watching a poor production in order to provide training for the playwright and cast, but want to be entertained well.

The standard of future productions will decide whether The Questers succeed or become just another Toronto small theatre failure.

The Theatre in the Dell is another of Toronto's small theatres but it is a professional theatre. Miss Sylvia Shaw and Mr. Loller (who has now left) started The Dell a year ago last June, and it has been very successful.

Explaining the reason for The Dell's success Miss Shaw said, "Theatre is a business and we run the Dell as a good business should be run." For her it is not just a plaything but her bread and butter. She has two aims, modest but worthwhile.

First, she wishes to put on plays that are seldom seen. Second, she wishes to promote actors whom she feels are in a rut because of type-casting and who have a great deal of talent which is going to waste.

The response has been extremely good. Audiences are aware that The Dell is not a Cabaret but professional theatre. I was surprised to learn that even though drinks and food are served, there is usually no noise of clinking glasses and munching of food. The audience is too busy watching the show and this in itself speaks highly for the performances.

Miss Shaw brought the idea back from Europe where revues are often done this way. It was new to Toronto and she felt the time was right. The Theatre in the Dell caters to a wide variety of people. The show is worth seeing and the atmosphere is relaxed.

The Central Library Theatre is also a professional company run by Marigold Charlesworth and Jean Roberts. Because of financial difficulties they are not continuing their repertory theatre this winter, but are planning single productions with different casts.

As Miss Roberts explained: "We wished to improve our visual and technical standards of production and we felt we could do a better job by concentrating on one show at a time. We are doing plays that we feel are worth doing and that the bigger theatres couldn't do since they have to appeal to a wider public."

In the past Miss Charlesworth and Miss Roberts have produced extremely good theatre. They spent three summers at the Red Barn Theatre at Jacksons Point, and last winter moved to the Central Library Theatre where they presented The Balcony, One Way Pendulum and The Rivals.

If they improve on their past record, the coming season should be good. Their first production The Fantasticks, starring Bruno Gerussi, has been held over until Jan. 5. The Central Library Theatre hopes to produce about six shows between now and Mar.

Hart House painting

More intolerable junk about — this time in Hart House. Why does it have to continue, all this interminable grovelling about with paint, the poor artist still deluding himself, the public thinking it is involved in a Great Experience with a Great Mind?

The technique is simple enough: get a bunch of paints, a large hunk of wood or cloth on the floor, and begin pouring scraping and smearing. You can stop when you want: either the wife calls, or paint gets on the floor, or you run out of smokeables. Or you can stop when you're satisfied. What is produced is a conglomeration of colour which, if you are successful, is pleasant to look at.

So called "non-representational stuff" we've had enough of such nonsense. Pleasantness is assured, but the abrogation of artistic experience is too great to be denied. Look at what artists of the past have done: they have taken things from our everyday life and put them in a certain context so that again the things take on a strangeness — they become meaningful. That, so far, is all that painters have been able to do.

Now, though, we get the modern breed who think that painting can approach music — that it can do the same thing as music does, but in a different medium.

Well, then, what does music do? It orders the mind in a time of its own: this is all it attempts — just to dominate the mind and inject a conditioning pulse and rhythm. No doubt this is why coughing, shuffling, etc., is so disturbing at a concert: there is an intrusion in the music's conditioning.

Painting has control over sight — notice how your eyes move about without settling down. Get into a gallery: a bunch of framed coloured blobs on the walls. One's eyes roam about the place. A painting has no possible chance to set up a conditioning of the mind. One's eyes comprehend the painting, but other things as well the paintings on either side, the room, the floor, the bearded proprietor.

This is no place for a conditioning rhythm to be set up, unless the room is the context itself. (Try wandering in University College and notice the conditioning that the architecture exudes). A painting, being so severely limited by space just can't expect to attain the state of music.

Well then, what else might a bunch of shapeless colours do? They can't convey anything about the world except the usual romantic views — brown for sadness, red for sensuousness, etc. — and Delacroix did this a century ago, along with other things.

It's just too pathetic, this delusion that the horrible affairs of Bellefleur, Letendre, McEwen, et al, have any value.

No, I have gone too far.

their paintings have value as designs, but designs are somewhat more barren than art, and I for one would not be willing to exchange the former for the latter.

Give me Cubism, Fauvism, Surrealism, give me an art to which I can relate, an art which will show me a strangeness about how I live, and what I live with, and not a bunch of unattached and formless colours. Thank goodness for 'The Art of Things' at the Jerrold Morris Gallery. The art of things is the only appropriate name for meaningful painting. Things are what we have, and we must have these made meaningful.

Why can't we rid ourselves of this other nonsense some people call art. I'm sick of stupid artists and culturally 'awake' Intellectuals. I've been fooled enough, and am ready to settle down into the comprehension of an insight deeper than my own.

However, for a kindergarten of colouring, you are invited to the Waste of Paint now on view at Hart House

The sound of surprise

by David Jackel

Horace Silver and his quintet have been in town since Monday, performing nightly for enthusiastic audiences at the First Floor Club. This is Silver's first Toronto appearance in seven years, a fact that would indicate this will be the first opportunity for younger jazz fans to hear in person one of the best jazz groups of recent years.

The numerous records made under Silver's own leadership have maintained a consistently high standard, due in part to his choice of sidemen and skill in composition, and in part to his policy of recording only two well-prepared albums annually, a practice which prevents him from churning out the routine blowing sessions which presently deluge the market. These records, and the quintet's highly successful performances at jazz festivals and night clubs, have established Silver's band as one of the most popular and most distinctive groups active in the jazz business.

Horace Silver first began to receive critical and public attention in the 1950s, when he served as pianist and arranger with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers. In 1956 Silver formed his own quintet, using part of the Blakey group of that period as a nucleus, and presenting a sound very similar to that associated with the Messengers. The pianist's solo work was at that time still much under the influence of Bud Powell, and his arrangements were good but generally routine examples of the hard bop style.

SILVER'S TALENTS DRAW POOR CROWDS

Since 1956 however, Silver's playing and writing talents have developed to the point where they could never be mistaken for those of any other soloist or composer.

His piano style has a jabbing, blues-based individuality which many more technically proficient pianists have been unable to achieve. This aspect of Silver's talent has often been overlooked because of his compositional ability and the excellent solo offerings of the hornmen in the group. But when presented in a trio context, as Silver is during part of each set this week, his solos stand up quite successfully to the greater demands made of the pianist in a smaller format.

Despite this solo ability, much of the attention is focused on Silver's compositions. Earlier this week the quintet was featuring some of the writing to be found on their latest album.

Some of the numbers are quite oddly structured. Nineteen Bars speaks for itself, while The Dragon Lady employs difficult changes and a number of breaks which are retained through the solos. With compositions like these to his credit, Silver has created for his group a style which never degenerates into the clichés of the hard bop or soul idioms, yet continues within this general area to produce vital jazz.

Blue Mitchell continues to maintain his position as an excellent trumpeter, who combines lyricism with a technique that keeps his tone clean both at fast tempos and in the upper register. Tenorist Junior Cook confirms in person the impression received from the latest Silver record. His solo ability has much improved, and he stood out Tuesday night in a driving solo on Let's Get to the Nitty Gritty, and another on Dragon Lady.

Drummer Roy Brooks was featured on Nineteen Bars, and turned in an excellent extended drum solo. Brooks built the four note opening phrase of the original tune through a series of intricate patterns which never lost sight of the starting point, and which never sacrificed musical values to those of noise or showmanship.

With all this talent on display, it is disappointing to report that crowds for the opening two nights were not good. Another attempt to present good jazz may yet be stifled by an outburst of Torontonians indifference.

HART HOUSE JAZZ

Downtown little has changed since last week. Poor singers and raucous dixieland are still packing the crowds into the taverns, which only proves that Toronto audiences need alcoholic stimulants in order to appreciate music. And if they can get something to drink the music doesn't have to be much better than mediocre. With only Wild Bill Davison providing any worthwhile jazz, it seems almost impossible to account in any other way for the large crowds downtown and the poor ones for Horace Silver.

Noon hour jazz concerts resume next week at Hart House. Trombonist Russ Little, who played very well recently with the Phil Branto sextet, will lead a group on Wednesday featuring Brian Barley and Herbie Helbig. Regulars at these noon hour concerts will remember Barley as the most impressive soloist with the Lorne Tepperman quintet last month. And for those who dug Tony Collacott's concert, the pianist will return for another noon hour session next month, this time in a trio setting.

Hart House will also be presenting the Rob McConnell big band in the Great Hall, on the evening of December 5. The band includes some of the best local professionals, with soloists such as Eric Traugott and Rick Wilkins, and a fine rhythm section of Archie Alleyne, Bill Britto, and Ed Bickert. Arrangements will be by McConnell, Britto and Wilkins and tickets will be available free of charge from the Hall Porter. Female guests are welcome at this concert.

ART

The international style

Abstract in black, white and ocre. Victor Pasmore.

Due to modern communication, the Art world, like every other 'world' in our modern age is shrinking year by year. Modern styles, as soon as they gain significance in one geographical area, quickly spread to the rest of the world. Artists in Toronto know of any significant new development almost as it occurs, whether in New York, London, Paris or Tokyo.

The result has been a decline in the importance of any one art centre. Our age does not have a nineteenth century Paris to rule on matters of Art. Also, style is so international that it is becoming increasingly impossible to see any peculiarities in style due to national or regional environment.

This pre-ambles in is reference to the current exhibition of Contemporary British Painting at the Art Gallery of Toronto. The British temperament has always generally been thought of as poetic, obsessive, and subtle. These qualities are visible in the current exhibition but here the national distinction ends. After the last world War, Britain once again was back in the international art world. Her artists had not been painting for almost a decade, while the Americans had been working steadily and had evolved a mature style called abstract expressionism.

The influence of the philosophy of this American style is behind most of the work currently being done in Britain. That is that art should have its source in the intuition, the instinct, "art happens, like falling in love" says Alan Davie, one of the artists represented in the show. It is the same philosophy which formed the "automatist" group in Montreal in the early war years. Reason has been abandoned; art is automatic; these, is a strong sensory relationship between the painter and the canvas. The painter reacts to the canvas painter and the canvas. The painter reacts to the canvas as he applies the paint. The painting, as he is working on it, reacts to him.

The British temperament shows itself in the finished canvas — the British instinctively use more subdued colouring, due to the heavy misty atmosphere of their country. They are also more subtle; as an example of this, compare Herron with New York's Rothko.

Abstract Expressionism of the subjective personal type described, is the main style in the current exhibition seen in relative degrees, and in the works of Herron, Davie, Frost and Wynter. However, the paintings of Nicholson and Pasmore and Scott point out another equally valid interpretation of the abstract. These artists are objective in their approach, classic in their simplicity and feeling. They reduce the visible world to essential shapes and arrange these simple shapes into a tight reasoned relationship on the canvas.

"The kind of paintings which I find exciting is not necessarily representational or non-representational, but is both musical and architectural, where the architectural construction is used to express a musical relationship between form, tone, and colour, and whether this visual musical relationship is slightly more or slightly less abstract is for me beside the point" — Ben Nicholson.

Graham Sutherland, as perhaps the best known and most individual of all the artists in this show, stands quite alone. His style is surrealistic yet abstract, in the objective sense. Sutherland takes as his point of departure something figurative, usually organic, such as a plant. Then as he builds up his painting he tends towards abstraction in such a way that certain motifs become dominant. The whole canvas has a dreamlike quality of unreality, yet reality: it invites us to look not at the painting, but through it to find some hidden meaning.

The exhibition of Contemporary British Painting includes fourteen of Britain's most outstanding artists. It continues at the Art Gallery of Toronto until December 19.

pensive but necessary programs at the metropolitan level. The township of Scarborough is the least well-endowed with taxable resources of all the larger municipalities and yet it has perhaps the greatest problems in providing in a very short space of time up-to-date services for a population spread over a wide area. Reeve Campbell's preoccupation is thus understandable.

Controller William Dennison has been winning elections regularly in the city for the past 30 years. Despite a lack of campaign funds and the opposition of the three Toronto newspapers, he polled almost 80,000 votes in 1962 and was re-elected.

Most of his support comes from working class voters and he receives a firm endorsement from the trade union movement. Not given to wild and empty rhetoric, he is best known for his work in investigating grievances and aiding ordinary people in their contacts with the local authorities.

His claim is that he gives personal service to his constituents, and the continuing support he commands among them suggests very strongly that they believe he does. A supporter of amalgamation, he is quite clear why he supports it, and his reasons are consistent with his whole approach to politics.

In fact consistency is Controller Dennison's strong point, and even if one disagrees with some of his views, it can come as a relief to find a local politician who really has worked out what he believes in and is not swayed by every gust of group opinion.

Alderman William Archer is a 'comer' in local politics. Still a young man, he is already an experienced politician. An able speaker, he is unusually well briefed on the problems of the metropolis. Despite pressure from his city colleagues, he is not a supporter of amalgamation. He has taken a good deal of interest in planning and transportation, and currently acts as the council's liaison man with the T.T.C.

A Jewish boy sings of confusion

CONFUSIONS: By JACK LUDWIG; MACLELLAND
& STEWART; 276 pages

I sing confusions too, I, Yehudah Leib Zolph, myself confused too, but alas a Canadian too, and as a Canadian Larry Zolf: tall, fat, hazel-eyed, but alas a typically Jewish nose (hold it! that's actually unfair, not only is my schnozzola not a typical Jewish nose, it is the very archetype of a Jewish nose — I no fool. Go two year college. Anglesch best all. So I know what archetype mean.)

Indeed, so Jewish is my kinky hair, my fleshy ears, my schnozzola, the schmaltz that overflows from my heart right into my fat face, that during the war the North Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Jewish Congress wanted to offer me, even up, to Eichmann in exchange for the six million. Gas me and you've broken the mould, they reasoned. But Eichmann said no dice. Well, what does he know from Jewish archetypes anyway. Without Hannah Arendt he'd still be a nobody.

Listen, Ludwig, let me tell you how I found out about you writing a book. It was a hot summer day, and, being unemployed, a graduate student in Canadian History, but still Jewish, I snuck in to the Holy Blossom Temple here in Toronto (it's air-conditioned, you know, Jack, honey) to get a little relief from that nagging Toronto humidity. So who should I bump into but a club-foot friend of mine from Winnipeg who's made good here in Toronto as barrister and solicitor — a little shylocking, a little foreclosing, a little real-estate developing, a stock here, a bond there, it adds up, Jackie — baby, believe me it really does.

He comes thumping over to me in the corridor like a playful Walt Disney Bunny and says to me: "Hook-nose, first of the Hebrews (this guy has a real narcissus complex, Jackie baby, he just digs physical jokes) "guess what, one of our own has written a novel."

I feigned surprise: "A shylock-shyster double-dealing lawyer from North Winnipeg has written a novel. Fantastic! Chalk up another miracle for the Lord." I shouted loud enough to disturb the Rabbi's sermon in the cavern within. "No, silly," clubfoot replied, "the Ludwig boy, you know, the English Professor who writes about North Winnipeg in The Atlantic Monthly. This time it's a novel."

Well, I've now read it: 276 pages of good humour, "crackling sardonic wit," "horsing around," "American seriousness" — Jewish subtle ty "prodigious weight" "force and inventive thrust" a veritable "burning thicket of language." And yet, alas, alas, I, Yehudah Leib Larry Louis Lawrence Zolf, Hook-nose, first of the Hebrews, sing confusions, for nary a word, a mention even, a casual reference, or even a subtle allusion to North Winnipeg, your home, Ludwig, your source of life and inspiration, the place from which you barmitzvahed, and then went on to bigger and better things, girls, even.

But that's not all, Ludwig, for a while there, for the first thirty pages or so, you really had me worried: not only no word about North Winnipeg but many a word I couldn't even recognize much less understand. Take page 10, for example, Ludwig, mein kind.

"Socially my schizophrenia comes from equal commitment to the culture's altruistic principles, and its predatory practices. The result? I don't want to play the game, but I want to win. Educated in cynicism, I trust obvious, though ambulatory, psychopaths. Like everybody else in American philosophy I'm dedicated to the proposition. I'm a first-phase and second-phase logical positivist, yet I rate high on the Behavioral Science "mysticism" scale.

Now the first part of the quote is clear as a bell, the second part I fed to an IBM computer. I expect an answer any day now. Or what about page 221,

"Sartre, Jaspers, Barth.... where, friends, is the authenticity that comes from engagement? This, o Martin Heidegger, is official termination notice. The world is full of Gallics who enjoy suffering, and can use it. Me? Catch me making a commitment, commit me. Involve me no more involvements. I shall buy a straw hat for a soft-shoe approach to existential stages. Engage for you, Gabriel of the no horn, and de-gage for me. Screw you, o troublous world, in spades."

Such soliloquies you'll never hear in North Winnipeg's pool rooms, bookie joints and dice parlours. Thank God, my uncle was a communist or I, myself, would never have understood this passage.

The only thing Canadian about this novel, Canadiana lovers, is Armand Flamand, a Canadian Cree Indian married to a Sholem Aleichem-loving Jewish girl from Brooklyn called Annette Schwartz.

Actually, the only thing Canadian about Flamand is that he prefers Labatts to Schlitz. As Gillis ie Ludwig puts it, "I've never seen a Canadian who couldn't con by flattering their beer."

Come to think of it, between Richler's Eskimo and Ludwig's Cree, I'm not surprised that most Americans think that this country is still made up of nothing but savages. So okay, the book is not about North Winnipeg or Canada, so what is it about? Well, the hero is called Joseph Gillis, formerly Galsky, who doesn't look Jewish, but is, and has the advantage of a PHD in English from Harvard, giving rise to his main confusion: he can't resolve his Yiddish Hasidic background with the gentle Americana requirements of an English instructor.

To help resolve this dilemma, he flirts with the Devil and invokes the aid of an archetypal Hasid. To boot, he is hated by Clegg, a Virginian English Professor of aristocratic birth and malice, and Person and Rymer, two faggy English instructors (Uhh, all this hate not because he's Jewish but because he's Harvard and they're not.)

Adding spice to the fun is Nancy, his wife, a beautiful Radcliffe girl of Puritan stock, who spends most of her time in attempts to psychoanalyze Gillis, her husband, who spends most of his time trying to seduce her.

But all turns out well in the end. Gillis triumphs over Clegg and all, as both Gillis and Nancy learn the lessons of life: "Change your life," forget "second things first," and "Desire nothing in this world but time to do your work, love, kisses, serious talk, laughter, great works of art, and a white Jaguar so you can get to these things more quickly."

Still, all is not lost, North Winnipeggers. Ludwig, after all, is a North End boy, and, God willing, class, working class that is, will out. Take Gillis' puritan wife — Nancy now if ever a girl talked like an ex-Jewish gang-bang for the Dead End Kids, Nancy certainly does. Sample: Nancy to husband Gillis panting to make her: "Kiss, kiss, kiss, fuck, fuck, fuck, when are you going to knock off the lover role and do something to advance your brilliant career."

That's not all fellows, hang up the pool cues, there's better stuff ahead: a pool room sequence, page 248 ff; a hilarious seduction scene involving a gorgeous New England chick called Pam, page 68 ff; an equally hilarious conversation about wife-swapping, page 169 ff; a non-consummation seduction scene with another gorgeous WASP chick called Kitten, page 210 ff; (God bless you, Ludwig, you haven't forgotten the old North Winnipeg motto: "The Whole World's Jewish When You're In Love.")

MUSIC

By DAVID S. BUNDLER

Many people today are too ready to condemn a composer for 'not being able to hear what he has written'. In fact, if he is a real composer, he always does hear, at least by calculation, everything he writes. —Stravinsky (1958)

Some twenty years before he said this, Stravinsky had provoked a storm of protest when he announced that music, by its very nature, was incapable of expressing anything. This recent utterance, that a composer hears, "at least by calculation," is no less cryptic and thought-provoking. But in both instances, the spirit is unmistakably contemporary in its brutal rationalism: together could form the long-sought-after principles for a Scientific Method of Musical Composition.

But the issues in both cases are perplexing and vague. Music is surely expressive at least in an absolute if not a referential sense (after Leonard Meyer), an intellectual or emotional response is elicited. It is only words that are in dispute.

Stravinsky argues that music is a language with its own grammar and its own subject matter. Thus if one wished to express wordly feelings or events, another medium would be more logical. But if music cannot express a specific emotion on its own, it can surely underscore moods and point up character. However, Stravinsky may only have been advocating the future course of an ideal music. In retrospect, he has valiantly tried to abide by his own advice, to the point of writing scores so coolly anti-expressive they border on the trivial.

Admittedly, these are the grossest of generalizations. But I suggest the effectiveness of the music is accurately represented. It is the lapses from his avowed approach that have yielded the finest moments in Stravinsky's works: the disturbing ostinato of the Oedipus chorus, obviously serving to convey the inexorable destiny of this wretched man; the mystical Laudate Deo of the Symphony of Psalms; and most significant of all, the recent works produced under the influence of Schoenberg and Webern. If Stravinsky was in search of a non-expressive music, why did he choose the serial technique, so often cited as the ideal means for reflecting the spirit of this Age of Anxiety?

I suspect that he chose this new direction so late in life for two reasons. First, he wanted a more complete tonal and rhythmic freedom, and secondly, the fear of becoming a "classic" began to frighten him. I mean that Stravinsky himself had come to realize how constricted his materials had become to him. Only in a music ordered by a new logic, free from traditional associations, could his art retain its Apollonian plasticity and freshness. But it is significant that although Stravinsky has not been able to go in the direction Boulez and Stockhausen pointed; he has realized that what they are doing is the new music. Yet, he is prevented by his own experience from joining them.

I think this is the point so often missed when Stravinsky is discussed these days, that the technique of Le Marteau or Gruppen is beyond his means and perhaps also his understanding. "I now hear the whole first movement of Webern's symphony tonally and melodically. I think everyone hears it more nearly tonally now than twenty years ago. Also, young people born to this music are able to hear more of it than we are." Stravinsky said recently when he wrote Le Sacre he was a revolutionary; even when he later turned to the cleaner neo-classical approach he was a leader. Even though he has discovered Schoenberg and Webern, we must recognize that he has unwittingly joined the rear-guard, if not the retreating forces.

With these thoughts in mind, I found it somewhat ironic to see Pierre Boulez, (on CBC-TV) a current enfant-terrible, performing not a recent Stravinsky score, but the fifty year old Le Sacre. It was a shocker in its time but is now music from another age. Being an avowed Apollonian himself, Boulez conducting Le Sacre attempted to strip the score of its elemental vitality and rawness. Unfortunately, Russian period Stravinsky cannot withstand such treatment. The performance emerged as puerile and corny. The modern school must either disown this work altogether or remember its historical context.

Boulez own Improvisation no. 2 on verses of Mallarme (of all people) seemed just too pure and too cute. Why is it that contemporary musical minds seek inspiration in the poetry of a dissimilar age? In our own country we have instances of an even worse practice, however: the setting of verses so innocuous there is hardly an earlier age that would have them.

In terms of musical materials Boulez remains precise and competent, if too often trivial. The complexity of his music is not remarkable now for it manages to be both terse and lucid after the example of Webern. I was pleased to read that in a lecture last summer, Boulez remarked that composers might now back off a little in favour of greater simplicity. But he knows, and Stravinsky knows, that banality is no less an evil than unintelligibility.

A hell is a hell is a hell; A Parker in the Dell

By ERIC RUMP

Sartre has said that hell is other people and Dorothy Parker would agree with him. People turn life into a living hell, she maintains, because once there is a relationship between two people — especially a sexual one — it is bound to sour through their mutually incompatible demands. If I want this and you want that it is obvious that we can't both have our way. Either one of them gives in, or, as she usually has it, the two part to look for better things elsewhere. It is around this central theme that she weaves her five sketches about life in New York, now on display at the Theatre in the Dell.

The first sketch deals with this in terms of Kit and Hobbie. Hobbie is a suave, young batchelor who finds his satisfaction in having an entourage of eager, young ladies. Kit is one of these, but having become involved with Hobbie, wishes herself to be first and the rest nowhere. So round and round they manoeuvre, with Hobbie trying to keep Kit in the position he wants, and Kit trying to drag him into the position she wants. The result is a draw; after a couple of cocktails and a flood of tears, they part.

the second sketch but the situation remains the same. Now we are in a speakeasy with another young couple, Flossie and Freddie, who are having a night on the town. Things go well for a time, till Flossie remembers another girl that Freddie had taken to the same place, and once more female possessiveness creates disorder. The inability to get what you want has a further development in this sketch in terms of horses. When drunk, Flossie becomes very fond of our dumb chums and likes to take them back to her apartment.

What she would really like to mother is a horse, but, as she herself points out, the man would never let her take it on the elevator. Once more the road to happiness gets blocked by other people.

"Too Bad" is about a perfect married couple, the Weldons. They are still devoted to each other seven years — or so it seems to those on the outside. But inside it is different. They are bored, tired, dispirited. Their various idiosyncrasies, once so charming, are now only a source of irritation. They fail to communicate, so that even when trying to please the other person they end up by producing the opposite effect. They too part.

In "Diary of a New York", a monologue, the emptiness of life in high society is displayed. It is the final sketch, however, "Glory in the Daytime", that turns out to be the darkest of them all. This concerns three women. One is fairly happy, for she has recently married, but her peace is being threatened by the attentions of a lesbian sculptor. Their little tea party is interrupted by a visit by Lily Wynton, a failing actress. She is so completely wrapped up in herself that other people have almost ceased to exist for her. She tells of her difficult life, of how men have always abused her. She gets steadily drunk on brandy, collapses, revives, and leaves, presumably to give another bad performance in a second rate play.

This rather bitter (though often witty) look at life is presented with a great deal of dash by a versatile cast of four. Barbara Chilcott and Anna Cameron are both excellent, though Anna Cameron adapted her style better to the small confines of the Dell stage. Roland Hewgill played all the male parts and was especially good as the despairing husband of "Too Bad" and Laura Gibson took whatever was left over. Peter Boretski has staged the plays with admirable ingenuity and the settings and costumes neatly catch the atmosphere of the Twenties.

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

The myth of the quarter was not the Paris myth I had come to find. It was a fairy tale myth I wanted, full of things I had been reading all my life. I wanted the exquisite cliché with all its legendary trimmings: wild drunks in Montmartre, jumping in fountains near the Ritz, riding on vegetable carts through Les Mayles, watching the world go by at the Dome or the Select. I tried them all, but the myth had gone, jumping into fountains only got you wet and arrested. Ah, to get into the index of somebody's biography, I would have thrown it all away for that. The first months in Paris were spent trying desperately to ferret out some kind of personal mythology: should I throw a brick through the window of a Wimp Bar? maybe swim across a goldfish pond in the Tuileries? start a riot on Bastille day? There were the only available myths, but of course they had no taste.

So Paris in the beginning was a longing for that. Long before my quarter days I'd go on scavenger hunts: bring back a hair from Alice B. Toklas's stubble, note the stains where Toulouse Lautrec vomited down a wall in Pigalle, put some air from Napoleon's tomb in a bottle. It didn't work out. I had come to the wrong time; I might still smell Picasso on Boulevard Raspail, watch Kate Thompson being propositioned in Harry's New York Bar, trace Jake Barnes hustling to work in the Avenue De L'Opera, but the pilgrimage was all sham, the myth had gone into hiding. There it was and there it wasn't.

Yet one afternoon, in the American Express, I almost had what was left of it. I stood unhappily in mid chamber staring at an enchanting, petite woman, almost a girl. She had whirls of long blonde hair tucked beneath a kerchief and she wore sneakers which spoiled the incredible sight of her legs. I was the only person in the American Express that day who knew that she was the actress Yvette Mimieux. It was an uncomfortable feeling. While a cast of thousands walked up and down boulevards and pursued their lives, I alone in all of Paris knew that she was Yvette Mimieux, girl starlet, secretly married. I stared with a foxy grin, unique with information. She was leaning against an information desk some yards away, looking dumbly at the floor, biting at a hangnail, mouth sour in a half pout. Then she looked up. I grinned and she bit her lip. Disguised as an entity, she fumbled in her straw purse for sunglasses. Was this the end of our abrupt relationship? that was no fun, so I reached deep into my jacket pocket and put on mine.

We stood there staring for awhile, each of us watching behind our points of view, then she broke into a wimpy smile, slight but real. I shrugged my shoulders like part of the game, and she drifted towards me, an almost dropsical swing to her belly. She put her elbows beside mine on the counter.

"Yvette?" She didn't turn to look at me, but a bubble of foam appeared on her mouth and she giggled. Already we were involved, something was going to happen, I was part of the tales to be told. The vision began to form quickly: Yvette Mimieux and I at Maxim's and afterward a carriage ride through Trocadero and then the boat down the Seine travelling to St. Germaine-au-Lays where we take a villa for the week. We are romping through the woods in the country light, scraping the green mould off the trees, watching the horses train on the lawns, asking the keeper of chateaux for the key to the red room.

The bubble on her mouth burst and she made a squeaky sound. There was a café I knew around the corner in Rue Auber and I began to build to that. To take that first step was to take them all. From the café around the corner we would begin a life together documented by Suzy and sanctioned by Elsa Maxwell (may she rest in peace). I wiggle through life in a state of grace: we always drink champagne on the road to Nice, we lie on the beach at San Feliu and pray to the gods of pleasure for supple body and Ethiopian smile, we are beautiful people and our times are gay, Yvette goes mad and must be committed, I dissipate and disappear in a lovely lost pose. Why not? so there I was.

Then I heard a piercing cry from a deep corner of the place and Yvette Mimieux's secretly married husband, bald with a huge blue ascot tucked to his chin, raced across the floor. "Yves, Yves," and it was all over. In my vision of St. Germaine-au-Lays, a horse manured, the red room was pink with age, the woods smelled of dead squirrel. The myth walked out of the American Express with a fat little man.

Garulous gargoyles

pounce on you at any second causing you the most unimaginable damage.

These doubtfully decorative pieces of antique architecture have been replaced on the new wing—known as the Laidlaw Library—by faces carved in stone.

The present contract calls for six such faces. The following is a list of the individuals you will see depicted there: Claude Bissell (president of the University of Toronto), Robert A. Laidlaw and Walter Laidlaw (both graduates of University College and members of the Laidlaw family which donated a substantial portion of the money for the building), Eric Phillips (Chairman of the Board of Governors), Dr. Moffat Woodside (former principal of UC, now vice-president (Academic), and O. D. Vaughan (Chairman of the Property Committee of the U of T Board of Governors).

Would anyone venture an opinion as to whether this is an improvement over gargoyles?

To produce the carvings, a clay mold was first made from a photograph of the person. From the mold a plaster cast was produced which was then used as a model in the carving operation.

It is planned to exhibit these casts in Hart House in the future.

There is room for nine more such faces on the new wing.

The idea for these carvings came from the architects Mathers and Haldenby.

Said Mr. Mathers: "This was a traditional place for stone carvings on old buildings.

"They used to put the bishop, the abbot and other ecclesiastical persons up there . . . and sometimes even the carver."

The carver on this project is one Palmo Bolzelli, an employee of Hibbert's Cut Stone.

UC can now boast six original Bolzellis

The new library wing at University College won't have any gargoyles (not in the strict interpretation of that word anyway).

What we mean is there will be no ugly serpent-like creature perched on the building looking as if it will

Gettysburg address a failure?

By ANDREW SZENDE

"We pass over the silly remarks of the President; for the credit of the nation we are willing that the veil of oblivion shall be dropped over them and that they shall no more be repeated or thought of."

Those were the words the Harrisburg Patriot and Union used on Friday, November 20, 1863 to describe a speech by the President of the United States the day before.

In fact no veil of oblivion was dropped over his remarks. On the contrary, that cool, windy Thursday afternoon has been permanently inscribed in the annals of history.

The occasion was the dedication of Cemetery Hill in Gettysburg. Abraham Lincoln spoke after an eloquent eulogy by Edward Everett.

And the speech, known the world over as The Gettysburg Address, is regarded today as a prose poem unsurpassed for dignity and pathos in the world's history.

But the Patriot and Union was by no means the only paper criticizing the speech. The Chicago Times noted "the exceeding bad taste which characterized the remarks of the President."

"The cheek of every American must tingle with shame," the Times continued, "as he reads the silly, flat and dishwatery utterances of the man who has to be pointed out to intelligent foreigners as the President of the United States."

The same article called Mr. Lincoln's "funeral sermon" an offensive exhibition of boorishness and vulgarity, and asked the question, "Is Mr. Lincoln less refined than a savage?"

Perhaps less surprising, and in fact less violent was the reaction of the Confederate press, typified by an editorial in the Richmond Examiner:

"A vein of comedy was permitted to mingle with the deep pathos of the piece. This singular novelty, and deviation from classic propriety, was heightened by assigning this part to the chief personage."

"Kings are usually made to speak in the magniloquent language supposed to be suited to their elevated position. On the present occasion Lincoln acted the clown."

Shocking though it may seem, the London Times wrote that "the ceremony was rendered ludicrous by some of the sallies of that poor President Lincoln. . . Anything more dull and commonplace it would not be easy to produce."

That was the way it was exactly one hundred years ago. The words they criticized were the same ones cherished today, "that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Kidd faces Williamson

University of Toronto's Bruce Kidd will be after his second national championship in as many weeks Saturday when he competes in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union harrier championships in Guelph.

Last week in Hamilton,
Kidd captured the Canadian Amateur Athletic Union cross-country championship.

Kidd's major opposition should come from University of New Brunswick runner Chris Williamson, representing the Atlantic Conference.
Williamson is the only Canadian to beat Kidd in the past two seasons, whipping him in a two-mile race this September.

Four Canadian intercollegiate conferences have each entered an individual and a team for the 5.6 mile race over the Federated Colleges' course.

The West's entry Manitoba is favored to take the team championship on the basis of a win over OQAA entry Mc-Master a year ago. Mac has defeated both the other two entries this fall — University of New Brunswick, and Royal Military College of the Ottawa-St. Lawrence loop.

Two weekend games for watertreaders

Varsity Waterpolo Blues journey to Montreal this weekend in efforts to perpetuate their monopoly on the Herschorn Cup and the OQAA Championship.

In recent years McGill and Varsity have been the only schools to contest the Her-schorn, and Redmen have usually been no match for Blues. Last year, Toronto swept the two-game total-point series 42-4.

With only three changes in their steamroller lineup of a year ago, Blues should have little trouble winning Saturday's first match of the home-and-home total series.

Blues exude so much confidence for the McGill game that they'll take in an exhibition match along the way.
Tonight Varsity stops off in Kingston for a match with Royal Military College.

Fencers open against RMC

Royal Military College provides the opposition for Varsity in the first dual fencing meet of the season Saturday at 12:30 p.m. in Hart House.

RMC's eight man team will challenge a strong U of T crew which has five fencers returning from last year's team in Peter Urban, Vlad Hat-schinski, Helmut Microy, Marty Moscovits and Tony Advokaat.
Urban is the intercollegiate sabre champion.

McMaster here tonight

By GORD BELLMORE

The hockey Blues have snapped McMaster Marlins' impressive three year unbeaten string on home ice.

Nobody had defeated the defending Queen's Cup Champions in their Dundas Arena stronghold since the 1960-61 season until Blues turned the trick with a 4-3 victory Wednesday night.

The victory came on the strength of a three goal outburst within a two minute span in the second period. Two rookies, Hank Monteith and Don Fuller, led the onslaught that ruined Marlins as Fuller sandwiched his marker between two by Monteith to give Blues a 4-2 lead.

Varsity survived a shaky first period in which the hosts hemmed Blues in their own end throughout, while Mac fired 17 shots at a steady Larry Soden in the Toronto goal. Marlins only managed two goals for their efforts, as Bob Apps and Jim McLellan tallied. Bob Awrey's goal for Varsity in the first stanza kept Marlins in sight until the two rookies took over in the second period.

Blues protected their lead for the remainder of the game allowed Marlins only one more goal by Bob Apps.

The game was the first of a two game home-and-home exhibition series. The two teams tangle in the rematch tonight at Varsity Arena. If Blues can duplicate their feat of Wednesday night they will establish themselves as favorites for the league title.

Coach Joe Kane is confident that he has the material for a championship team. Blues are still without the services of last year's twin sensations Ward Passi and Steve Monteith, who are recovering from injuries. When they return the team will be considerably strengthened.

In the meantime, Don Fuller and Hank Monteith are taking up where Passi and Steve Monteith left off. Fuller has scored five times in two games, while Monteith has netted the puck four times in the last three games.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Vic eyes Mulock after win over Dents

By AL SCHOENBORN

Defending Mulock Cup champions Victoria College yesterday advanced to the interfac football finals with a convincing 20-6 win over Dentistry. The dentists threw up a gritty defence in the penalty-filled match, but the Scarlet and Gold offence proved too strong and Vic's offensive dominance finally provided the difference.

Vic opened the game with an impressive running attack but were stalled after Dents recovered a fumbled pitchout on its own 30-yard line. Soon after Vic knocked the ball loose from Dents' q.b. and scored a touchdown only to have it nullified by an offside penalty. Vic finally scored after a dubious pass interference penalty put Vic on the dentists' 12-yard line. Ed Addison plunged over for the score and Phil Rimmington converted.

After four successive Vic penalties put Dents on the Vic four-yard line, Brand Holmes ran up a t.d. A bad snap killed the attempted convert, and Vic led 7-6 at halftime.

A 34 yard pass and run play to Peter Stille put the Red and Gold into a 13-6 third-quarter lead.

This was one of the few passes thrown by either team as Vic appeared content with a crunching ground attack, whereas there just was no Dentistry offense.

The final score for Vic came when John Bennett went over for the insurance points from the Dentistry two-yard line in the last minute of the game. The convert was again booted by Rimmington.

HOCKEY

UC I, the new Group I entry, surprised a highly touted St. Mike's A team 5-1 Wednesday.

It took the Redmen, who finished third in Group II last year, just nine seconds to make their presence felt in the big league as Don Lillow hit the twice.

Other UC goals came from Doug Whelpdale, Jody Curran, Bob Wardell and Nelson Neff. Barry McDougall counted for the Double Blue.

Intermediate hockey action saw New College beat Emmanuel 6-2, while Pharmacy C downed Music 4-1. Vic VI edged Meds C 3-2, SPS III made it 3-1 over St. Mike's D. Vic V shut out SPS IV 4-0, and Trinity C tied Vic IV 4-4.

VARSITY HOSTS WOMEN'S INTERCOL SWIM MEET

The Benson Building, the only true female stronghold on campus, is opening its virgin gates to male spectators this weekend.

The occasion is the Women's Intercollegiate Swim Meet.

The tournament, which has been strictly a Toronto-Western-McGill affair, will be boasting three new competitors in McMaster, Queen's and O.A.C. This will certainly add new colour to the watery competition The T-W-M Triumvirate has passed the championship from fin to fin since 1935. Varsity, in recent years, was winner in 1958 and 1961.

The 1961 fiasco saw the girls receive the Intercollegiate Swim Trophy, presented for the first time by the Queen's Levana Society.

At that meet, Varsity overwhelmed McGill 60 to 42. Last year McGill squeezed by Toronto 45 to 44.

Aquatic prophets, on the basis of past performance, are inclined to favor McGill in the synchronized and diving events, while Western will have an edge in the speed.

However, Toronto's power is not to be overlooked; their depth and all-around strength should put them on top at the final gun.

This year a very young but ambitious Varsity team will attempt to outwit such veterans as Mary Lou Whitwill of Western, 1962 record holder in the 100-yard free style (1:01.6), and 50-yard breaststroke (34.3), and Sara Barber of McMaster, former U of T and Olympic backstroke (1961 U of T record 50-yard backstroke, 31.1).

Seasoned veteran, Nancy Aston (III Vic), and promising newcomers, Fair Lindsay (I Trin) and Martha Madden (I SMC), have shown enough drive in the interfaculty competitions to be serious contenders in speed events.

Divers Judy Ireland (IV Trin) a veteran of three intercollegiate tournaments, and Gill Davies (I Vic) will have their hands full with a fresh crop of McGill experts.

Synchronized events, as always, remain a mystery.

Although Toronto is displaying a strong group, it will be under pressure to equal or better last year's first place in strokes, figures and solo events.

The tournament will officially open this Friday at 7 p.m. with the synchronized and diving events.

On Saturday, speed events and demonstrations by Friday night winners will start at 10 a.m.

Blues off to Maritimes

By RICK KOLLINS
Varsity Sports Editor

Varsity Blues left Toronto International Airport yesterday for Halifax with hopes of taking up where they left off last November. Blues became the toasts of Maritime football last year by defeating St. Francis Xavier University X-Men of Antigonish, N.S., 20-14, in the fourth Atlantic Bowl.

The Atlantic Football Conference's pride in their best team, St. F.X., couldn't allow Maritimers to take the defeat lightly, however, and Blues were invited back this year to defend their bowl title. In 1962, Blues faced a team with the most impressive record in Canadian college football. When they take on X-Men tomorrow at Wanderers' Grounds that record will be even more impressive.

X-Men, who won the first three Atlantic Bowls against teams from the Ontario Intercollegiate Conference, have yet to be defeated in Maritime competition since 1957. They sport the unbelievable record of 51 consecutive victories in league and playoff games over the past six seasons.

Maritimers feel this year's St. F.X. team is the best yet and Blues will have to be at their peak to contend with the Xavierians. Coached by former Ottawa Rough Rider Don Loney, who has built the St. F.X. power house since he assumed the reigns in 1957, X-Men have shattered practically every record in the Atlantic Conference book this season.

They won eight games without a defeat in league play after disposing of McGill Redmen, 14-7, in an exhibition game. In the A.F.C. they averaged 50.6 points per game while giving up only 21 points the entire season. Their most impressive win was a 90-0 shellacking of Stadacona, also a conference record.

The sobering factor behind these shattering records is that St. F.X. had little competition in their conference. But nonetheless, Dalt White and his Blues realize X-Men are no pushovers from a small Atlantic college.

Both White and Loney have difficult chores in preparing for tomorrow's game since they have seen little of their opposition this season. Movies have been the coaches' only real source of information.

"They were strong running outside last year," commented the Varsity coach before he left for Halifax, "and there's no reason to believe they won't employ the same strategy this time."

White feels Blues will be better prepared for this game, however, than they were last year when they had to come from behind a 14-7 deficit in the second half.

"I hope the good weather they're having down there holds up," said White, "because we'd like to throw the ball a lot. Last year the greasy field hurt our passing and we only completed one toss. I think we have better passing this year than last."

"We're in better shape physically than we were in our final game against Queen's. Pold (guard Kaspar) and Fisher (tackle Jim) have recovered from injuries and Hall (halfback Harold) is okay after reinjuring his ribs."

Tackle Bill Jackson, who tore knee ligaments at McGill, and end Ross Dainty, who suffered a concussion in the final game against Queen's, are the only regulars who didn't make the trip. J. Fraser and A. Grodzinski will continue to handle Jackson's spot on the defensive line and Doug Bucknam will play Dainty's offensive end spot. Tom Verth and rookie Wally Seccombe, who impressed against Queen's, will handle the defensive ends, spelled off by Bucknam.

In addition to the game, it will be quite a social weekend for Blues as they take part in the Maritimes' answer to the Grey Cup festival. Items on the agenda include a luncheon given by the city of Halifax and a dinner tendered by the province of Nova Scotia.

Fistaminations: Lineman Jim Lunnie, who missed the season after suffering torn knee ligaments in pre-season practice, is back in a cast after prematurely trying out the injured limb. Lunnie had hoped to join Blues for the bowl game but was reinjured in a cast after prematurely trying out the injured limb. Lunnie had hoped to join Blues for the bowl game but was reinjured in a workout this week . . . This game will likely be the final one in the Varsity careers of Jim Fisher, Ray German, Harold Hall, Mike Kelly, Dave McCullough and Kaspar Pold . . . Blues are staying at the Lord Nelson Hotel in Halifax after finding the accommodations at Shearwater Naval Base, 10 miles from Halifax, a little awkward last year . . .

Lewis excels as Blues edge Stars 2-1

By KATY O'SULLIVAN

In a dramatic finish to the first Varsity Soccer Blues — Interfaculty Allstars game, and an equally dramatic finish to his own collegiate soccer career, Bobby Lewis scored two goals in the last five minutes of play Wednesday to lead Blues to a 2-1 victory over the Allstars.

Interfac goalkeeper Walt Bulas, had his hands on Lewis' first shot, but fumbled and dropped the ball in into the nets, while the second goal was a perfect shot from five yards out.

Peter Marsh booted the Allstars' goal when the game had been in progress only two minutes.

While Blues dominated the game, they were hampered by their erratic shooting; they couldn't seem to put the ball between the goal posts.

Starting off sluggishly in the first half, Varsity picked up speed in the second period and made a determined push on Allstars' goal — it was only a matter of time then until they put in the winning goals.

The Interfac squad didn't seem intimidated by its underdog status. They played a fast, rough game, and although they had never played before as a team they showed a team spirit that made them favorites with the lunchtime crowd of 500.

HALIFAX IS GREAT . . . IF YOU GET THERE

By the time this column catches your eye, I hope to be basking in the frivolity of that Maritime madness known as the Atlantic Bowl festival. I can't be sure, however, that my destination will be reached . . . o one can ever be sure when he flies to Halifax that he's going to wind up in Halifax.

I know this only too well, and so do members of Varsity Blues' 1962 football team.

When the Varsity delegation to the Atlantic Bowl (players, coaches, manager, trainers, doctor and one sports editor) left Toronto International Airport last year, we all anticipated a pleasant flight to the eastern seaboard. From Toronto to Montreal it was fine and dandy. The first two hours out of Montreal were also great.

Then I made my first mistake.

"What time do we arrive in Halifax?", I meekly asked an attractive stewardess.

"What do you mean, DO we arrive in Halifax?", came the stern reply. "You mean IF we arrive in Halifax."

My mind went haywire. I had heard about these hijacked planes going to Cuba and I could see myself cutting sugar cane while an armed Castro type tickled my ribs with a bayonet.

My stewardess friend saved the day.

"At this time of the year," she said, "we're lucky if we can land in Halifax. It's the rainy season and often the fog is so bad that we can't land there."

That's just fine. Here I am going to Halifax, anticipating a great weekend, and now they tell me that I may never get there.

My next question was obvious (to me anyway).

"Well then, my dear, where do we land?"

I expected to hear Labrador, Newfoundland, Cape Breton or even London, England.

"Perhaps Moncton," came the reply, more stern than before.

"How far is Moncton from Halifax?"

"Oh, about 250 miles by car."

"By car!"

Here I expected to enjoy the longest plane flight of my life and now they're talking about driving a car from Moncton to Halifax. I should have stayed home and studied.

ANCHORS AWEIGH . . . FAR, FAR AWAY PLEASE

I shouldn't have opened my big yap. A car would have been a luxury. After about two hours in Moncton's old dilapidated airport, which resembles something out of Charles Lindbergh's story, we were on our way again.

By car? No. By plane? No. By bus? Yes.

The flight by plane from Moncton to Halifax takes about an hour. The bus ride took six hours. And what a bus ride! About 35 of us were cramped into this ancient chariot and the charioteer was doing, like, 70 miles per hour in a terrific storm along strictly winding road.

If it hadn't been for the bawdy songs of one Arthur Ransom Parker, we would have all died from confinement, frustration and boredom. They gave us a bit of a break, though . . . a stop-over for a bite to eat in Truro, Nova Scotia.

Now, Truro is just the place that everyone must see in his lifetime. Oh, how I had always dreamed of a night in Truro . . . Those overdue essays seemed far away than ever now.

The restaurant didn't look too bad . . . "The Sugar Bowl", the sign read . . . "The sweetest place in the Maritimes." They certainly weren't referring to the scent when they drew up that sign, that's for sure.

Robert Noel Irving Bates thought it was a great chance to try some authentic Maritime clam chowder, right here in the Maritimes.

"Sorry sir," said the waitress, "we don't have that stuff."

James D. Fisher thought it was a good time to try the men's room.

"Sorry sir, we don't have that either."

I finally did get something to eat, but only after spending half an hour convincing the waitress that . . . "Yes, I DO want to eat it right here." . . . I got my order, complete with all the take-out conveniences. . . no knife, no fork, no nothing.

After the six-hour ride, needless to say, we arrived in Halifax. The thought of a nice soft bed almost intoxicated me.

Then I found out that the beds in a navy barracks (Shearwater Naval Base, Royal Canadian Navy) aren't nice, and they aren't soft . . . in fact, I doubt if you can really call them beds without offending Webster.

The mattress sank to the floor when I rested my 160 (ahem) pounds on it. I now knew what it felt like to sleep in a hammock. This was it. I had been forced into the Navy. What will my mother think?

One John S. McManus had the same idea. "If this building starts rolling in the waves, we know we're in trouble."

Then I flaked out. Thank God!

The ball — not my head, you idiot! Midair collision between Trinity's Bill Barnveld and Soccer Blue Keith Murphy was part of action during Wednesday's All-Star tilt.

March for Canada winds towards Queen's Park, Friday morning.

3000 students demonstrate concern for Confederation at Queen's Park

About 3,000 University of Toronto students demonstrated their concern over the future of Confederation Friday by participating in the March for Canada on Queen's Park.

Despite threatening rain, the students marched in an orderly column three abreast from behind the SAC building to the front of the Parliament buildings.

They presented, through their spokesman Doug Ward, a brief requesting that Premier Roberts maintain an understanding attitude towards the problems affecting Canada in the Federal-Provincial conference opening in Ottawa Tuesday.

From the steps of the Parliament buildings, Doug Ward delivered a speech to which Roberts then replied.

"We have decided to miss our lectures rather than miss this opportunity," said Ward.

"We are concerned about the French-Canadian fact. Our neighbors to the East are accomplishing a renaissance and a revolution which are giving fresh vitality to their cultural group.

"We must heed the call of Quebec if the concert of Canada is to be harmonious," he told the assembled students.

He said that students wanted to give voice to their hope that Canada will not turn into a land separated from Quebec by an international border.

Roberts in answer again avoided a direct statement of his policies and called the situation "serious but not desperate."

"I am optimistic that we can find solutions," he stated.

Roberts commented that he was happy the students were displaying their opinion. He recalled that in his undergraduate years he had participated in a similar march protesting a cut-back in grants to universities.

The march was termed a tremendous success by the organizers. But the most important part of the project — a wide coverage by the press, radio and TV — failed to materialize after the death of President Kennedy.

Yet, as a display that English Canada would no longer remain silent about French-English relations, it was successful.

Observers remarked on the

JFK was speaker at debate

The late John F. Kennedy came only once to Toronto and was to return in the New Year. Both the past and proposed visits were by invitation of the University of Toronto.

The late president was honorary speaker at a Hart House debate in November of 1957, when he was a junior senator from Massachusetts.

Last week, the university announced it had received a reply from Kennedy to an invitation to receive an honorary law degree from the Faculty of Law.

The Varsity relayed the acceptance news in a story that reached students four hours before the president was shot in Dallas, Tex.

The question of granting the degree posthumously—the first such proposal at this university—will probably be considered when the university Senate meets Dec. 13.

Kennedy's appearance drew the largest crowd on record for debates in Hart House. The motion, The United States has Failed in its Role as a World Leader, was defeated 204-194. An overflow crowd listened in a downstairs common room.

The then future-president's attitudes to foreign policy were determined even then. He defended the United States' "status quo" during the period when most countries were changing, saying US foreign policy must be judged by "the law of the possible."

He said it was impossible to form a "coherent pattern" when the very nations the US was attempting to lead were so disunited.

He suggested that many saw Communism as the only alternative to the status quo.

At a press conference after the debate, Kennedy said Canada had a major role to play in the world, and should make a greater effort to employ Canadians in the development of Canadian resources.

The senator praised the male-only character of Hart House, but took up a challenge from Warden Joseph McCulley that he speak to co-eds next morning.

At 8:30 a.m. next day he addressed an assembly at St. Michael's College's Carr Hall. The audience was mostly of women.

Kennedy told McCulley, however: "The drive toward female superiority in my land to the south has gone so far that it is a pleasure to come here where males are not afraid to say what they think of the opposite sex."

For comments on the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, see pages 4 and 5.

THE EDWARD KYLIE TRUST AWARD

Applications may be made to the Secretary of the Edward Kylie Trust on or before December 31, 1963, by candidates for the Edward Kylie Trust Award to the year 1964-65. These applications should be made in writing and should give particulars of the qualifications and record of the applicant with a view to the following requirements. The Award will be made to a male student who is a British subject, either a graduate or an under-graduate of Arts, preferably in the course of Modern History at the University of Toronto, to enable him to pursue his studies in Great Britain. The Trustees shall make their award to that candidate who appears from his record at the University to be most likely to occupy a position of leadership and influence in the Community. The sum available is Nine Hundred Dollars ($900.00) for the year 1964-65 and the Trustees may renew the award for a second year if they are satisfied with the first year's record. The trustees, upon receiving applications, will arrange for the examination of the candidates and if the trustees are not satisfied as to the suitability of any of the candidates they will have the right to withhold the award. Dated this 13th day of November, A.D. 1963.

6 one-acters to be produced

Six University of Toronto students will have their award-winning one-act plays presented at this year's One-Act Play Festival.

A total of 24 original entries were judged by Professor Clifford Leach of University College, Globe and Mail critic Herbert Whittaker, and graduate student Howard Adelman. The University of Toronto Drama Committee sponsored the competition which drew 18 of its 24 entries from University College.

The winners will share a $60 prize, since the judges preferred not to rank the plays. They described the entries as "of unusually high calibre." Judges last year were displeased with the quality of the seven entries.

The winning plays and students are: The White Nigger Poodles, by Jon Ancevech (III UC); The Sojourners, by Rose Veighey (III UC); Trial and Error, by Alan Hughes (SGS); Mr. Terpid's Inquest, by Ian Porter (III UC); A Child Shouldn't Worry about the Bomb, by Lawrence Matthews (II UC); and The Elephant's Graveyard, by Peter Such (SGS).

Four other entries were given honorable mention. They are: Betty Clark (II UC) for As the Stone Age Passes; Murray Riess (I UC) for Pretzels are not for Breakfast and Maybe not even for Lunch; Alan Hughes for The Song Thrush; Douglas Arrell (I Trin) for How I Murdered my Husband.

There will be open casting sessions for the winning plays in the Women's Union Theatre, Dec. 2 to 6 from 2 to 5 p.m.

Wills $2,000,000 to U of T

The sole surviving inheritance of a four and one-half million dollar estate, Mary Haney Beatty, died Oct. 20, leaving half of her fortune to the University of Toronto.

Her executors announced she had willed just over two million dollars each to University of Toronto and McGill University.

She lived virtually unknown to neighbours and relatives. Perhaps on account of her long illness she had almost no contact with the outside world. A partial recluse, she shunned all publicity, while giving away about $400,000 to charity in the last five years.

She was the last survivor of the shipowning and railway-managing Beatty family. Her father was the founder of a line of Great Lakes steamships later taken over by Canadian Pacific.

Her brothers, one the chief surgeon, the other the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, increased the Beatty fortune. Both died long before her.

seriousness of the crowd — a proof that they were sincerely interested.

Don Munro (IV APSC), Engineering Society president, had to restrain one student carrying a sign with the letters FLQ, and during the first few seconds of Ward's speech a heckler cried out from the audience. These were the only deviations from order in the crowd.

Faculty members, members of the registrar's office — all sections of the university were represented at this important function.

One participant even marched on crutches.

Ward compared Canada to an orchestra with many sections. "At this present juncture, Quebec is the section which needs the most strengthening, the most understanding."

At the end of the ceremony, the Blue and White Band played O Canada and the students joined in singing.

Contrary to the fears of the organizers, the leaving was as orderly as the coming.

(Last night Ward released this statement:

"Friday noon, responsible student action gained new life on our campus. In an university where too often the impact of student commitment is fragmented because of our physical divisions or our parochialism, Engineers worked with Arts-men and campus groups of every nature focussed upon a single cause.

"Above all, 2,000 of you put aside other demands and marched for Canada. The march was serious, orderly, and has reflected favorably on the university we represented. The chill, the waiting and the drizzle which accompanied our demonstration lead me to believe that inasmuch as 'cold feet' may have been a physical condition of our march, it certainly does not reflect the attitude of our students on important issues.")

To hold memorial services for JFK at Convocation Hall, SMC

A university service of remembrance for the late President John Fitzgerald Kennedy will be held today at 1:10 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

G. M. Craig, associate professor of American history, will give a short address in the service arranged by the Students' Administrative Council.

A prayer by Doug Ward (III Enm), SAC president, will close the service.

Students of all colleges and faculties of the university are invited to attend.

St. Michael's College will be the only college in the University of Toronto officially mourning the death of the late president.

College President Rev. J. M. Kelly will celebrate a solemn high Mass of Requiem in St. Basil's Church at 4:15 p.m. He will be assisted by Assistant Registrar Rev. John Gibbons and moderator of student activities Rev. L. J. Elmer.

Rev. John Madden, a PhD from Harvard University, will give a short eulogy.

St. Michael's, which has a heavy enrolment of American students, will also send a delegation to the American embassy to sign the mourners' book on behalf of the students of the college.

A meeting of university student leaders scheduled for last night was cancelled after a suitable form of memorial service could not be decided upon.

Six men from Sir Daniel Wilson residence have left to attend the funeral guard for the president today. Three American women from St. Joseph's residence did the same.

UC Lit deadlocked over open meetings

The University College Literary and Athletic Society Royal Commission inquiry into the role of student government fought to a standstill Sunday afternoon.

The commission had heard briefs from various UC personalities Wednesday night. It also had made a study of student government in the other colleges.

The deadlock arose between the autocrats and the democrats. One group felt that the "open meetings" of the society should be abolished and that the executive should govern alone.

The other group wanted to set up a representative council to be the supreme governing body.

The issue arose after it became impossible in the last few years to get a quorum of 50 members out to the open meeting. University College is one of the last sections of the university that still maintains the "open meeting" where all members of the college can come and vote. But it seems that this is to be consigned to the scrap heap.

There was general agreement that the college government must play a restricted role in today's university. It was decided that the main problem was one of communications.

Open $1,600,000 Pharmacy Building

The University of Toronto's new $1,600,000 Pharmacy Building at the corner of Russell and Huron Streets was officially opened Thursday.

The opening was a special prologue to two days of celebrations which ended Saturday commemorating the new faculty development.

Dr. Glen Jenkins, dean of Pharmacy at Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind., delivered the opening address in Convocation Hall.

He spoke on the duty of the pharmacist to the people. "It is the duty of the physician to diagnose and prescribe, and of the pharmacist to make up and supply the medicine."

Outlining the importance of the pharmacist's position in the world today, he said: "He must have control of the distribution of all medicines, and must be able to fit the medicine to the patient. He must be ready to correct false impressions made by false advertising, to inform the patient and the doctor about all new drugs and advise of all possible unforeseen reactions."

After the address, the assembly moved to the building itself. After a short speech by President Bissell, Basil Ludlow, architect of the structure, presented the traditional gold key to Dean F. N. Hughes.

Dean Hughes said the building was a great deal like an iceberg. "You see the building, but not the immense amount of work that goes with it."

Dean Jenkins was then given the key by Dean Hughes.

The official opening was followed by a reception in the building. Student guides gave tours of the building.

The president's dinner in honor of the opening was held in the Great Hall of Hart House Thursday night, when a portrait of Dean Hughes was unveiled.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Pledgemaster chained

A University of Western Ontario student was found chained to a pillar on a St. George St. fraternity house Saturday morning.

Police spokesmen at No. 11 station said the incident involving a kidnapped pledgemaster "could have proved fatal, considering the cold weather."

Walter Barclay, 21, was found by police chained to a pillar at the Delta Upsilon fraternity house, wearing only a shirt and pyjama pants. He was exposed for about an hour before police freed him of 18 feet of chain and four padlocks.

Barclay said his pledges kidnapped him after a dance at London and brought him to Toronto. They had planned on chaining him to pipes on the Island ferry, but he convinced them he might get hurt.

"There will be serious trouble if something like this happens again," a police spokesman said.

Need Volunteers

A call has gone out for student volunteers to aid in the organization of an interfaculty quiz tournament, a project of the education committee of the Students' Administrative Council.

Organization will be completely in the hands of the students. This is the reason student volunteers have been requested for judges, question-makers and other participants.

The tournament will be run in the form of lunch-hour question sessions between five-man college teams until gradual elimination results in a championship match.

Point amassment is the final object of the competition. Ten-point questions are asked to team members, who raise hands to answer them. A 20-point bonus question is then offered to the team correctly answering.

To open X art exhibit

Arnold Rockman, one of Canada's best known art critics and commentators, will speak at the current Hart House art exhibition "Recent Campus Architecture," Wednesday at 1:15 p.m.

The exhibition is a comprehensive study of University of Toronto architecture of the past three years. The display includes scale models, large photographs, diagrams and floor plans of Sidney Smith Hall, Massey College, the Edward Johnson Building, the new Victoria College and University College libraries and the new chemistry and zoology buildings.

our responsibility

President John F. Kennedy will be buried today and as the shock of his assassination wears off the whole world wonders what repercussions his violent death will create.

For almost three years President Kennedy strove to break down the barriers of dissension, hatred and prejudice which prevented men from living together in peaceful equality.

For a time, after the announcement of the president's death flashed across the world, men forgot their ideological and partisan differences.

They were drawn together by a common grief — and perhaps a common fear.

Perhaps for the first time, men realized what a vital and essential force for peace President Kennedy stood for. And they wondered what the future would hold without him.

The discussions on what might happen in the future have started already; and within the next days, weeks and months we can expect that the communications media will devote a tremendous amount of time and space to covering and re-covering all the possibilities.

In all likelihood Friday's assassination is the biggest news story in history. To this end the communications media are searching out any piece of fact, opinion and accusation pertinent to the situation.

But the frightening aspect is that this communications concentration may help aggravate the very type of reaction which President Kennedy devoted his life to eliminating.

Because the suspected assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald, was a Marxist and was connected with the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, it is almost a certainty there will be a reaction against leftist sympathizers and activities. How intensive this reaction will be is still a matter of speculation.

It is not difficult to imagine what could happen and it is possible that we will see in the United States an anti-leftist sentiment which will make the McCarthy era a Sunday school picnic by comparison.

There will certainly be some polarization of the left and right. It is possible that a political schism could develop to the extent that all the advances made by President Kennedy during his term of office would be eliminated.

Any polarization which does develop will be accentuated by the newspaper, radio and television services as they continue their search for new and interesting material.

When we heard of the president's death, and our initial shock had subsided, our thoughts turned to the future. In what ways would we be affected, and in what ways could we as individual students act to help right the wrong which had been committed?

The answer to the first question remains to be seen. But the answer to the second lies within every one of us.

Although it is obvious we can do nothing to rectify the wrong, and little to affect the chain of coming events, we need not continue to feel helpless.

As intelligent and educated individuals our duty and responsibility is one of maintaining a clear perspective in the days to come. We must not allow ourselves to be swayed by reactionary and emotional arguments. If we do we will only be helping to reinstate the evils of hatred, bigotry and prejudice which John F. Kennedy fought to eliminate.

The highest price

By D. J. DUCKWORTH

(D. J. Duckworth, who is an American citizen, is in first year medicine at the University of Toronto.)

As the radio in the Faculty of Medicine blared Friday's stunning news to several startled students huddled around it, a janitor spoke: "He was just a man, what's all the fuss about? We are all created equal, aren't we?"

A student, obviously moved by the news and perturbed by this statement, quickly responded: "Yes, we are all created equal, but it is what we do with this equality from birth which determines our greatness."

Such a man was John F. Kennedy, the 35th President of the United States, who now belongs to the ages. The irony of this statement is that Mr. Kennedy, though highly-born to one of America's wealthiest families, was the champion of the little man.

President Kennedy's death means the tragic loss to the United States and the world of a statesman and leader whose wisdom and determination surpassed the vigor of his youthful years.

But most of all, John Kennedy is a loss to his people. Not only does the president represent the head of the government, but to the American people he is a figurehead, the embodiment of the ideas and the ideals that represent the American way of life.

Mr. Kennedy was all this and more. The life of John Kennedy and his young family allowed the people, especially those who, like him, were young, to personally identify their families with his.

The children playing on White House furniture, a lovely wife who waterskied and built snowmen on the White House lawn with her children, a president whose love of humor frequently kept his crowds laughing—all these images are very close to the lives of American families.

Whatever the reason, the laborer, the waitress, the sal-lor, the housewife, the student—they all loved him.

Yes. Loved.

With the death of the president, something died in the hearts of all Americans; someone who was as much a personal friend to each one of them as if he were a member of their own families was taken from them.

A man who believed that the rights of men came not from the generosity of the state but from the hand of God, John Kennedy had the respect of the mightiest and the weakest.

Today his people are numb.

President Kennedy, as president Lincoln before him, was a champion of equality. In his inaugural address, Mr. Kennedy spoke to what he called "a new generation of Americans", describing them as "proud of their ancient heritage and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today".

Stressing time and time again that there was no place in American life or laws for race, Mr. Kennedy relentlessly strove to take racial equality out of the words of the constitution and put them into the hearts of his people. He referred to this problem as "a moral issue as old as the Scriptures and as clear as the American Constitution."

In a world plagued with an avalanche of conformity, there is uncommon virtue in a man who attempts to conserve the human individual. Such a man was John Kennedy.

For this President Kennedy was also hated by some. He was constantly criticized by racists and rightists. But he was never stopped or even slowed. John Kennedy, following what he believed, always looked forward for the light and never backwards at his shadow. He practised the courage which he so respected in others.

Kennedy, winning the presidency at a time when the cold war was relegating the United States to a second-rate power, was given an almost impossible task. He set out "to turn the tide" and turn it he did.

Calling on his people to "bear the burden of a long and twilight struggle", Mr. Kennedy moved into the White House, as the United States was nervous, outmanoeuvred in the strategy of the cold war, a second-class power in space, and a country whose failure to act was costing it the leadership of the free world.

It was in the face of this listlessness that a young and vigorous President was to put into effect his "New Frontier".

"Neither wind nor tide is always with us," he said. "Our course on a dark and stormy sea cannot always be clear. But we have set sail... we have begun".

Prime Minister Pearson said of the late President, "His appeal was not to the comfortable but to the daring." Daring he was as he stood up to crisis after crisis which faced his country in his short term as President. As a result of this the cold war thawed and the Soviets again came to respect the determination of the United States. For this turn of the tide, we have to thank the young president gunned down in Dallas Friday.

While he held the reins of power in the White House, his country returned to a position of world respect, respect for a country that knew where it was going, said so, and took that road despite all difficulties.

When this generation has passed away and the tongues which today praise or criticize have turned to the dumb dust of death, it will be written that John F. Kennedy walked with the American people in their vast diversity and gave them all he had toward moving on into a new phase of their great human adventure.

Such as he was, he gave himself outright. To lead the land he loved in the path of its ideals, he has paid the highest price. Greater love than this hath no man.

Letters to the Editor

Urges sanity

Mr. Ken Drushka, Editor, The Varsity.

Dear Mr. Editor, Events have meanings. Events played out on the world's stage, like the tragic death of President Kennedy, have meanings for all men. I sincerely hope that Toronto students, with the help of their newspaper, will spend some time in searching for those meanings and for indications of appropriate actions which they might take.

Let me suggest some for a start.

The assassination took place in a community that had become dehumanized and polarized. Perhaps these two words mean the same thing. At any rate, if the suspect Oswald did pull the trigger, he clearly shot at a symbol and not at a human being. In a society that allows itself to become polarized it is perhaps accidental from which pole the assassin comes. The man who spat at Adlai Stevenson in Dallas some time ago, spit at a "communist". The man who shot Kennedy, shot an "imperialist warmonger." Both men are human beings whose policies, philosophies, and ideals deserve more sensitive treatment than that.

Let us work for a more humane kind of political climate. Let us hope that individuals and groups critical of government policy will not be silenced by this event. A democracy would be unhealthy without them. Only let those who criticize do so with a greater sensitivity to the burdens and risks taken by the men who are on the spot, in power, where rough decisions must be made.

George Hopton, General Secretary, SCM

Congratulates leaders

Dear Editor, I should like to congratulate Doug Ward, Rich Pope, Jim Laver and all the organizers of Friday's march. It was a most successful demonstration of what the students of this campus can do.

Of course, we all appreciate the fact that under the circumstances we could not expect full publicity. But nevertheless, these campus leaders deserve recognition.

They don't shoot presidents anymore

(Bob Åmdursky is a law graduate of Cornell and Harvard universities. He was a member of the editorial board of the Cornell Sun. He now teaches law at the University of Buffalo. In this article, written especially for The Varsity, he describes reaction in part of the United States to the assassination of President Kennedy last Friday.)

By BOB ÅMDURSKY

BUFFALO (Special) — The nation was stunned.

It listened to the first reports of the assassination in shock and disbelief. Nothing in the experience of our generation had prepared us for this murder.

"They just don't shoot presidents any more," we thought, "at least not here."

All normal activity came to an immediate halt. Events of every kind were cancelled. Instead we clustered around our radios and television sets and, to an amazing extent, remained there throughout the weekend.

If we were dismayed by the intimacy of the details, we were too involved in the tragedy to tear ourselves away.

No doubt even now we do not fully comprehend the reality of the act. But shock and disbelief have given way to a more poignant emotion. The nation grieves with Jacqueline Kennedy.

It is, of course, natural for a people to feel a deep sense of loss on the death of their leader. But to us, this president was more than a national leader and our grief is surprisingly personal.

There was a charismatic quality about John Fitzgerald

Kennedy. He was young, vigorous, dynamic and articulate. He was the very embodiment of what we hoped was our national image. Consequently our generation felt a very real sense of identification with him in life and a personal loss in death.

But there was even more. There was what we have come to think of as Our Golden Family. Everywhere she went, Mrs. Kennedy was a source of national pride.

Her culture and beauty lent credence to the late president's self introduction as the man "who accompanied Jackie Kennedy to Paris."

The spontaneous and often humorous escapades of Caroline and "John John," as his father liked to call him, made us feel that there was in fact a family in our White House.

The reaction to Lee Harvey Oswald, the man accused of shooting the president, was somewhat puzzling. For the most part, the crowds were not angry. They were simply curious and disbelieving: What manner of creature was this who could commit so heinous a crime?

However, one man at least was angry. Now Oswald also lies dead, victim of another murderer's bullet.

Few questioned the stability of our government or the orderliness of our presidential succession.

Nevertheless, some view with misgivings the ascension of Lyndon Johnson to the position of leadership. He is, they say, an unproved quantity at a time of racial crisis at home and of strained relations abroad.

It is, however, fair to say that the great majority in America regard their new president with considerable confidence. They point to his record in Congress as a persuasive leader, a deft administrator, a great compromiser and a consummate politician.

Moreover, he apparently comes to his new office with full knowledge of our domestic and foreign policies.

If Mr. Johnson did not emerge in the vice-presidency as a figure of national prominence, perhaps this was due to the very nature of the position. If he lacks the personal charm and sophistication of a Kennedy, we have good grounds for believing that he possesses comparable courage, determination and judgment.

On the eve of the change of administration, the nation can agree on at least one thing. A great man has died but the presidency lives on.

Text of Ward's speech at Queen's Park

Prime Minister Robarts, Fellow Students,

We have marched here today, and presented this brief, because we wish to break our past silence and address to you our concern for Canada.

We are concerned about "le fait Canadien français", the French-Canadian Fact. Our neighbors to the east are accomplishing a renaissance and revolution which are giving fresh vitality to their cultural group.

We are aware of the power of this fact, and we know something of the directions that power can take. The 20th century has witnessed that no force can stand in the road of a nation which is intent upon helping itself to find its place in the sun.

In the light of this, we are fearful of the statements which have prefixed the forthcoming Federal-Provincial Conference. We are not swayed by the easy language of ultimatums, but we do fear that such statements can cloud over the present reality of the French-Canadian Fact.

And the question for us is this: do we deal with Quebec now, when men of good hope can be assembled on both sides; or through blindness to emerging forces, shall we frustrate the support for moderate spirits, and thus the ascendancy of lesser ideals, and lesser men?

Canada is an orchestra with many sections. At this present juncture, Quebec is the section which needs the most strengthening, the most understanding, if only because of the self-improvement she manifests. Our section alone cannot do justice to the score, nor may we re-orchestrate the music of the times to leave out one section. We must heed the call of Quebec if the concert of Canada is to be harmonious.

This is no foreign aid which we suggest, nor is it the fragmentation of our country, but the chance to so develop Canada that she will be able to play a larger role in the world, because of the lessons she has learned within her own precinct.

Biculturalism is widely supported today, and I trust that we are not deceived into thinking that this is only a question of languages and the arts. It must begin in the field of education, and in this, we have a vested interest. And if it implies education, then it demands an economy which can meet the expense, Quebec needs the fiscal considerations today for her singular problem to ensure sound cultural growth. Anything less will sadly indicate that we are content with a ceremonial Biculturalism.

We are not, I trust, students reflecting upon the state of the nation from the comforts of the ivory tower. We have decided to miss our lectures rather than this opportunity. Through this march, we are catching up a student involvement and commitment which has spread to us from our French-Canadian contemporaries; and as one of them has noted, we students are perhaps apprentice-doctors, and apprentice-engineers, but we are not apprentice citizens. And thus we consider our march necessary, in order to fill the void between the extremes we have heard, and thus you may be sure, Mr. Prime Minister, that we shall follow the Conference, and your participation therein, with the keenest interest.

We have no neat solutions to offer you. We do wish to give voice to our hope that we shall be able to grow up in Canada where those things which separate the French from the English will be the creative differences of language and culture, and not a border between two countries, and a record of myopic relations.

It has been suggested that Macdonald united our country and Laurier united our people. Today we need statesmen who are capable of taking up both challenges, in the light of a new Quebec.

You can play Othello nude

By ERIC RUMP

For those intending to see this production of Othello (and everybody should) a word of warning should be given about the opening. When you enter the theatre you will see a stage that is bare except for a number of ordinary kitchen chairs. The house lights will dim and the actors will enter, dressed in their everyday clothes and carrying scripts in their hands. Then the play starts. Now this does not mean, as some in the audience assumed, that the actors hadn't learned their parts, or that the scenery or costumes had failed to arrive. It means that the director is trying a new approach.

What he has done is to treat the first act as a sort of prologue to the rest of the play. Just as in other Jacobean plays you have actors talking about the parts they are later to play, so here you have actors playing their parts while remaining outside them, because of the way they are dressed, the cigarettes they are smoking, the scripts they are carrying in their hands. Gradually, however, the actor and his part draw closer together, so that by Act II you have what you might have expected to see at the beginning—actors dressed in doublet and hose, an Othello who is black of face, and only those present on stage who have a part in that scene.

I am not sure that this particular way of staging the play makes much difference. If the director, Gordon Johnson, had had his actors clothed from the beginning, the total effect would have been the same. What it does demonstrate, perhaps, is the versatility of Shakespeare's verse—you can play it anyway you like—in the round, in the square, in the nude;—without destroying it. Provided, that is, you have actors competent enough to play it.

In this Gordon Johnson has been fortunate, especially with his Iago, played by Leslie Mulholland. Throughout the play he displays a surprisingly accurate grasp of a number of the facets of Iago's slippery character. He is all heartiness and rough kindness in his dealings with Roderigo. With Othello, he assumes a mask of soldierly admiration and respect, the bluff NCO trying his best to help the commander he so much admires. With Emilia he is cold and unfeeling, with Desdemona, ingratiatingly gauche, and with Cassio, honest friendship itself. In his soliloquies he is the confidante to us all. Standing at the very front of the apron stage, cool and relaxed, he is both author and director of the play we are about to witness. He informs us in a chatty manner of how the plot will develop, of what to look for, then once more retires back into the action so we can witness it ourselves.

Othello is probably a more taxing part for a young actor to play because it is difficult to prevent Othello's emotional excesses from degenerating into bombast or rant. John Wright, who plays the part, hasn't entirely avoided this danger, largely through his diction. In moments of emotional intensity his words get swallowed up by the strength of his emotions, so that little of what he is saying reaches even the first few rows. Perhaps that is why he is more convincing in the first half, when he is calmer, and Iago's poison hasn't yet started to work.

Also the director has allowed very little comic relief into the play and this too makes for Othello's part becoming monotonous. Roderigo (Hersh Zeifman) is played straight—a normal, average individual who is after something that he doesn't get. He is quite colorless and therefore provides distraction without amusement. The balance of the play would have been much improved if he had been played, as he can easily be, as a mannered and mindless gull from a Jonsonian city comedy.

All three women in the play handle their parts well. Desdemona (Marita Ensio) is kittenishly naive and winsome and is well balanced off against Emilia (Barbara Kirshenblatt), strong, brown and earthy, slow thinking but tenacious once started. Lynne Brown as Bianca looked splendid in her long scarlet dress and does all that is required of her.

Finally, a grateful mention should be extended to the carillon in Hart House which sprang into unexpected life some where in the second half of the play and kept going for a good half hour. Perhaps your reviewer is unduly sensitive to this instrument, having lived close to those melodious bells for the last two years, but once more we were all reminded of it at a time when its presence had temporarily escaped our minds.

Blues dumped Marlin's for the second time in three nights with a 5-3 victory here Friday before 2,500 fans. Blues had edged Marlin's 4-3 in Dundas on Wednesday.

Varsity left no doubt Friday which was the better team. The hosts almost chased Mac out of the rink in the first period, and ran up four goals before Marlin's could regain their composure.

Thereafter, Blues gave Marlin's a lesson in checking and despite the fact the visitors outscored Blues 3-1 for the remainder of the game, the issue was never in doubt.

Varsity took six penalties in the final two periods including two majors for drawing blood, but Marlin's didn't score with the man advantage. George Olah delighted the crowd with his superb penalty killing, which earned him the first of the game's three stars. Blues' close checking when shorthanded completely handicapped Mac's power play, and when Mac did break through, they were foiled by the sure goaltending of Casey Soden, making his debut in the Toronto goal.

Olah and Sonny Osborne gave Blues a 2-0 lead within 30 seconds in the third minute of the opening period. Don Fuller and Boz Awrey made the score 4-0 and Fraser Bushell netted Marlin's first goal before the period ended.

Jerry Marlborough gave Blues a 5-1 lead in the second period before Bill Gibson and Bushell counted for Mac.

Stray Shots: The three stars were Olah, Bushell and Varsity defenceman Ian Sinclair. . . Blues outshot Mac 39-33. . . The Federated Colleges (OAVC) will be here for Blues' final exhibition game Friday.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

St. Mike's gains final Mulock round

The Irish of St. Mike's, their main opponents the rain and a slimy Varsity Stadium field, romped to a decisive 27-0 victory over Pharmacy in a Mulock Cup interfaculty football semi-final contest Friday.

The double blue squad now faces the formidable task of meeting defending Mulock Cup champions Victoria College in the final at the Stadium Wednesday at 1 p.m. Vic skipped into the final with a 20-6 decision over Dentistry.

St. Mike's left no doubts in the minds of the wet spectators that they were going to win. The first time they gained possession of the ball, they moved for a touchdown with Vern McCreary going over from the one-yard line. Tony Fiorini ran for the convert.

Quarterback Paul Dedumets guided SMC for another major before the half, handing off to Rick Agro at the two-yard line for the score. Bill (Rip) Meagher missed the convert.

John Govan ran the second-half opening kick off back for a 90-yard t. d. and Pat Hennessey completed the major scoring with a fourth-quarter touchdown. Meagher kicked two converts in the second half.

SOCCER

Playoffs started as SPS III edged Trinity B. 2-1 for the Group II championship and the right to meet UC I in the semi-final.

Wolf Reznicek and Tom Ruckholm scored for Skule while Ron Nkomba hit for Trinity.

RUGGER

Meds B edged Vic IV 5-0 in quarter-final play in Division I to advance to the semis against defending champs Vic I.

Bob Reddle scored the try for the doctors, while Bob McGee added the convert.

LACROSSE

St. Mike's A moved to within one game of a perfect record in Group I with an 11-3 win over Dentistry. The Double Blue are 7-0 but their remaining game could knock them out of first place as they meet PHE A (6-1).

A Phys Ed win would give PHE A first place because of a better goals record. The date and time of the big battle is Tuesday at 1 p.m.

SPS I upped its Group II record to 5-0 with a narrow 6-5 win over UC.

Pharmacy goalie, Rick Pearen, abruptly halted UC's scoring rampage at 23 goals in two games as the druggists shut out UC 2-0.

WATERPOLO'S DROWNED

MONTREAL—Kees Klerks scored seven goals Saturday to lead McGill to a 10-2 victory in the first of a two-game total-goals series for the intercollegiate water polo championship.

Larry Bell and Ed Watkins scored for Varsity.

U of T wins in first fencing meet

University of Toronto fencers opened their season on a winning note Saturday, out-duelling Royal Military College 38-14 in a meet at Hart House.

Four Blues accounted for 25 of the home sides' victories, as Helmut Microys, Vlad Hatschinski, and Peter Urban each posted seven wins against a single loss, while Nansung Ho chalked up five wins without a setback.

Marty Moscovits and Tony Advocaat were other outstanding Blues, compiling 4-1 and 3-2 records respectively.

Blues next competition will be in two weeks against the University of Rochester.

As Blues lose to St. F. X. in Atlantic Bowl, 15-9

THE SAME OLD STORY

By RICK KOLLINS
Varsity Sports Editor

HALIFAX—The setting was different but the script was the same.

Varsity Blues found that even here in Halifax against a team from another conference they couldn't escape from their bad habits of the recent Senior, Intercollegiate season. It was the continuing uncanny inability of Blues to score, combined with a few lapses amid an otherwise outstanding defensive effort that allowed St. Francis Xavier University X-Men to win the Atlantic Bowl, 15-9, and regain the Stanfield Trophy. Blues had won the trophy with a 20-14 victory over X-

Men in last year's bowl game.

Some 4,000 rabid Maritime football fans saw why Blues won only one game in league play this season although they were never really outclassed in most of their games. Blues moved the ball along the ground as well as they have all season but they stalled when touchdown territory was near.

Coach Dalt White's plans to pass the ball frequently went to no avail as quarterbacks Bryce Taylor and Jim Israel only connected on five of 23 attempts. Halfback Harold Hall threw one pass and it was intercepted.

If it hadn't been for the field-goal kicking of Taylor, Blues would have been thoroughly disgraced without scoring a point. Taylor attempted four field goals and clicked on three, from the 24, 33 and 38-yard lines.

The Varsity defence played well, as it has all season, but once again a few isolated mistakes brought about the downfall. The vaunted St. F. X. running attack only gained a paltry 75 yards and on 12 occasions X-Men were stopped on ground plays for losses or no gains.

St. F. X. quarterbacks Roger Sevigny and Doug Billing, who shared duties, completed seven passes, only two more than Varsity, but these gained 197 yards. Only three of the completions went for more than 13 yards but two of these resulted in X-Men's two touchdowns.

In the second quarter, after Taylor's first field goal, Sevigny found end Joel Lamorre, a native of Toronto, in the clear and passed to him for a 47-yard gain to Varsity's 10-yard line. Three plays later, fullback Joe Franciose barged over from the two-yard line for the touchdown.

And in the third quarter, with X-Men leading 7-6, Billing hit halfback Ken Bussey at the Varsity 35-yard line and Bussey escaped defenders Gerry Sternberg and Mike Kelly to run for the winning t.d. Bussey made the grab with Sternberg and Kelly covering him like a blanket and then after he was apparently stopped he broke away to complete the 70-yard play.

Ed Amaral, who set an Atlantic Football Conference record this season by scoring 100 points, kicked two converts for St. F. X. and Todd Scott added a single to complete the scoring.

Although Varsity contributed to its own defeat, X-Men were full value for the victory and proved they could compete in the Senior circuit. It was the second time in eight days that a SIFL team has been upset by another conference representative. A week before, Queen's Golden Gaels dropped a 25-7 decision to University of Alberta in the Golden Bowl at Edmonton.

X-Men were a stronger team than the one which lost to Blues last year. They had more depth in their lineup and considerably more weight. They outweighed Blues on both the offensive and defensive lines.

The St. F. X. defensive front wall played an important role in stopping the Varsity passing as it constantly harassed Taylor and Israel. Defence end John Shaw and defensive tackle Steve Connolly were particularly prominent for X-Men.

The game was principally a defensive struggle as the Varsity defenders also shone except for the few plays mentioned above. Middle guard Dave McCullough and tackle Andy Grodzinski each partially blocked a punt and Blues recovered three fumbles.

Israel started at quarterback for Blues but injured a knee early in the second half and Taylor went the rest of the way. Sevigny quarterbacked the first half for X-Men and Billing took over in the last 30 minutes.

Notes: Statistically, no individuals stood out. Sternberg gained 39 yards for Blues on 10 carries, Bill Watters was 25 for 6 carries, Tim Purves 30 for 6 and Harold Hall 23 for 5. Amaral and Franciose each rushed for 30 yards on 9 and 8 carries respectively. Watters took over Varsity's punting after Israel was injured and averaged 31.4 yards per kick. Israel kicked for a 36.5-yard average.

X-Men intercepted three passes, one of them in the last minute of the game with Blues at the St. F. X. 34-yard line. Blues intercepted one pass but missed on three other interception chances. On one occasion, Ken Davison had an open track to the end zone but just couldn't hold on to a Billing pass at the St. F. X. 25-yard line.

Women pool sharks and Sara Barber win championships

day and Saturday.

The "pool sharks", in a supreme team effort, regained the Queen's Swim Trophy with an 85-point score. McGill placed second with 73, followed by Western, 71, and newcomers McMaster, 33, and OAC, 29.5.

Co-starring in the affair was Sara Barber, a McMaster and Olympic backstroker, who set records in the 50-yard backstroke and butterfly events. U of T girls set a record of their own in the 200-yard freestyle relay.

The best character role of the evening was played by Diana Crosbie of Varsity who, while charming the packed gallery, was able to win the skills and figures events, the solo event, and was a member of the winning Toronto trio team.

The diving was won by Marion Dike of Western.

Atlantic football's finest hour

FIRST QUARTER

Varsity — In the last moment of the quarter, Bryce Taylor booted a 24-yard field goal. The score was set up by a 31-yard gain on a pass from quarterback Jim Israel to Gerry Sternberg.

Varsity 3—St. F. X. 0

SECOND QUARTER

St. F. X. — Taylor's field goal, St. Francis Xavier moved 75 yards in eight plays for a touchdown, fullback Joe Franciose going over from the two-yard line. Ed Amaral added the convert.

Varsity 3—St. F. X. 7

Varsity — In the last minute of the first half, Taylor kicked his second field goal, this one from the 33-yard line after Blues' drive was stalled at the St. F. X. 25-yard line. Varsity had gained possession in St. F. X. territory after Andy Grodzinski partially blocked a punt by Todd Scott of X-Men.

Varsity 6—St. F. X. 7

St. F. X. — Quarterback Doug Billing tossed to Ken Bussey at the Varsity 35-yard line and Bussey escaped the grasps of Gerry Sternberg and Mike Kelly, 1 run, for the 70-yard touchdown.

Parties back biculturalism

Solid support for biculturalism—in different forms according to party—was expressed in Monday's opening debate on party policies by representatives of the four campus parties.

Two parties said they would agree to a provincial demand to secede.

To a rapt audience of about 15 people the representatives argued heatedly in the UC Junior Common Room for 45 minutes.

Alan Bowker of the New Democratic Party emphasized that Quebec is "un nation": a national entity by language, cultural background, geographical area and religion. It is not merely one of 10 provinces. It is a state which existed for 300 years.

He went on to say that the French-Canadians have just in the past two years emerged as a group with a purpose, a sense of unified existence.

Finally, Bowker said that Quebec, as a "nation," has special responsibilities. As such it must be given special privileges. He concluded by saying that if Canada must be split into two countries, we must let it, if human rights are involved.

Equal representation for French and English in the Canadian government was stressed by Wilfred Szczesny, of the Communist party.

He said that biculturalism is not a satisfactory safeguard of French-Canadian rights. What is needed is a new constitution in which representatives of the French-Canadian and English-Canadian nations are equal.

"The French should be allowed to exist," said Szczesny, "not only socially, but also politically." He felt that biculturalism would not give them this right because it would not prevent their being overwhelmed and assimilated.

He emphasized that the Communist party is not in favor of Canada's splitting in two. Rather, he said its idea is the establishment of a government in which either nation can withdraw if it wishes.

Biculturalism through education is the main plank of the Progressive Conservative platform, according to Richard Tan (III Meds), PC parliamentary leader.

He explained that French Canada is not represented by Quebec alone, but that there are pockets of French throughout Canada. In fact, his assertion was that Quebec and French-Canadians are two separate entities, and not to be confused with each other.

He felt colloquial French should be taught in Canada from Grade I. Each English person should do his share in understanding the French. "We should all take an active part in Canadian affairs, such as last week's March for Canada," he said.

Liberal Party speaker Colin Campbell (II Vic) argued that the only way to achieve equality for the French is to compromise.

"Canada is economically and socially one nation, but culturally and socially divided. Because of this division, Confederation is in danger."

He pointed out that toleration and understanding cannot be legislated, and that a Liberal government would not sacrifice Canada to extremists of either side. It was his opinion, however, that Canada can be bicultural within the framework of the constitution.

Further points in the Liberal program, outlined by Campbell, included making French and English constitutionally equal languages where the population of either culture is appreciable, and enabling the provinces to participate in the federal fund program without financial loss.

Student exchanges with Quebec and France, a scholarship program to encourage bilingualism, and free lessons in French for federal civil servants were also proposed.

A question-and-answer period concluded the meeting.

Memorial services for JFK well attended by students

About 1,400 University of Toronto students paid formal remembrance to the late President John Kennedy Monday at a service in Convocation Hall.

Another 1,000 attended a special remembrance Mass in St. Basil's Church at St. Michael's College.

The noon day university service, arranged by the Students' Administrative Council, consisted of a eulogy by Professor G. M. Craig of the history department (for text, see page 5), and a short prayer by SAC President Doug Ward (III Emm).

Rev. John Madden of SMC urged students attending the Mass to "find strength and hope in the victory (over death) which Christ has already won and which He wills to share with us."

Taking his text from the Lesson of St. Paul in the special Mass, Father Madden quoted: "Brethren, make no mistake about those who have gone to their rest; you are not to lament over them as the rest of the world does, with no hope to live by. We believe, after all, that Jesus underwent death and rose again."

Father Madden asked God to give "courage and wisdom to President Johnson, and that peace and justice for all men to which John Kennedy had dedicated himself."

"In our shocked sorrow, in our fears for the future, in our compassion for those dear to President Kennedy, we find our strength and hope in Christ's victory. . . . We pray that God will make that victory complete in the person of John Kennedy."

The Mass was celebrated by college president Rev. John Kelly, a native American.

Students from all sections of the university signed the book of remembrance at the American embassy on University Ave. during the day of mourning called for by President Johnson.

Most resident students saw part of the Washington funeral over common room televisions. All flags on the campus were flown at half mast Monday.

The late president may receive a posthumous law degree if the university Senate so decides at a meeting next month.

Red head derides biculturalism

Sam Walsh, organizer of the Quebec Communist Party, Monday said the concept of bilingualism and biculturalism is merely "the most popular fad" at the moment.

Mr. Walsh said a union of French and English Canada is not the most feasible solution to Canada's problems. Such a union, he said, is like "a marriage which, without granting the right of divorce, is not a voluntary union and does not recognize the equality of both partners."

While in favor of the right of separation for both nations, Mr. Walsh denied being a Separatist. The granting of full sovereignty to Quebec, he said, will "de-fuse the time bomb due to go off before Canada's centennial, and allow Canadians to concentrate on the more important problem of meeting the challenges of the new industrial revolution—automation."

Lenin defined a nation as a historically established community with a common territory and language, a stable economy and a national psychology expressed in a common culture, Mr. Walsh said. Hence, he said, Canada is "a bi-national state composed of French Canada, or Quebec, and English Canada with its nine subdivisions or provinces."

As nations, both French and English Canada are entitled to the right of self-determination, he said.

logical viewpoints. They were expelled from the New Democratic Party last spring.

In a phone conversation with Forum Secretary Hans Modlich (II APSC), who is also president of the so-called "Trotsky" wing, Walsh said the CP was "not so sure anymore about the Moscow line."

"The party brass is attempting to evade the issue which has already divided the rank and file," Modlich replied, referring to the Sino-Soviet issue.

The Socialist Forum is a non-political body which discusses impartially the different forms of communism.

Rift in Communist groups

A second breakdown in the campus Communists' machine may be near, if a rift in the allegedly non-biased Socialist Forum is any indication.

Communist Party officials backed out of a Forum debate last week, which was to have discussed the Sino-Soviet dispute. Tim Walsh (III UC), CP club president and Forum vice-president, said his party leaders would not "debate the issue in public or with Trotskyists."

The "Trotskyists" are the members of the newly-formed Socialist Club, which left the Communist Party Club after a split in ideol-

SGS offers 6 summer grad courses

A sudden burst of expansion has hit the graduate program for the first time in many years. This year six graduate departments will be offering summer courses to grad students at the University of Toronto.

The new plan is meant to speed the training of graduate students.

Dr. E. Sirluck, associate dean of the School of Graduate Studies, believes the new courses will be a means of cutting down the casualty rate prevailing in the higher degrees of student work.

"If the thesis can be started sooner," he said, "a great deal of waste, both of time and of the students, can be reduced."

In addition to the regular English and French department courses, history, political science, philosophy and music will be given the full treatment.

These courses are planned to extend over a period of 14 weeks, from the end of May to the end of August.

They are equivalent to and patterned on regular term courses, with the same admission requirements, grading and results. They must be compressed into half the time and consequently the regular number of lectures during the period must be doubled.

Students may take up to the maximum number of two courses.

Dr. Sirluck said this was one of the greatest improvements to come in the graduate school. "The summer program is going to grow and grow and grow," he said, "and become an integral part of the graduate program."

The courses are also meant to help meet a forecast shortage of university teachers in Ontario. Student population is expected to jump to 100,000 from 35,000 by 1970, with a corresponding increase necessary at the teaching level to 8,300 from 2,800.

With this in mind, the School of Graduate Studies is offering a special eight-week course for teachers in post-graduate work toward advanced degrees.

"The work can be used for graduate credit, but only up to the level of Master of Arts," said Dean Sirluck.

A new graduate degree, Master of Philosophy, is being created, again in hopes of a speedup in production of teachers. It will mean more than an M.A. degree, and it will be different from but not inferior to a doctorate in philosophy.

Arrangements are being negotiated with the library to provide times essentially similar to those of the regular term, except for an earlier closing on Saturday. The increase in library services is expected to be an important factor in summer work.

The $1,500 Province of Ontario Graduate Fellowships may provide a sum of $500 for summer work, if the admitted student is in residence and doing supervised work for which a report is available for his department.

Last year a total of 2,057 students were enrolled during the summer months, 1,612 in extension courses, 57 in graduate work and 388 in teaching studies.

The influx of next summer's graduates will probably swell this number considerably.

Warden Joseph McCulley says he expects no more overcrowding in Hart House than usual. "other than the usual crush in the Arbor Room."

"We throw the House open to the summer students," he said. "While the regular winter activities are shut down, we do try to take their place with other things."

He said the discussions in the quadrangle between Professor Marcus Long and well-known personalities would continue this summer, along with the exhibitions of sculpture and paintings which are a usual feature of the House.

SAC president Doug Ward said many graduate students are mostly concerned with finishing their degrees and getting into business, or spending more time with their families, and that they often do not take a great deal of interest in the university and the activities offered there.

This is a factor in the possibility of The Varsity's being a continuous, year-round newspaper.

"If the students want it during the summer, they'll have to pay for it themselves," said SAC President Doug Ward.

Interfac quiz needs help

The Interfaculty Quiz Tournament needs help.

Student volunteers are needed to help organize this new club, as question-makers, judges and other participants.

The Tournament itself is planned along the lines of a quiz game. Five-man college teams compete to answer questions given by a moderator.

If a team answers a 10-point question correctly, it gets a chance at a 20-point bonus question.

The continued competition and point amassment will eliminate contestants until a championship match results.

Only undergraduates are eligible.

Volunteers can leave their names on a list provided in the SAC office.

Says morality is personal

Admitting his inexperience in the topic under discussion, and describing his lecture Monday evening as a novel "splashing in the theological pool," Rev. John Madden began his lecture in Carr Hall: "The Dynamics of Love."

He described a new change in Christian morality, and a current shift in the idea of the Church. "Today," he said, "there is less emphasis on the Church as a rule-making organization, as a big club, as a tightly knit group with finely defined borders."

"Whereas morality was previously merely external conformity, a contemporary deepening now tells us what it is to be living a life in the Church. There is a deepened philosophy of the person."

He said our relationship with God must involve our total personalities. This aspect of contemporary attitude to morality he defined as a personal response, or personal love.

But this new personal love must conform to certain standards.

Our religion, he explained, must be a fellowship with God in which there must be communication with Him. God must be thought of as a person who loves us individually "not just as a mass of tapioca."

"And there must be a mature response to God's love, not just blind conformity to rules, tradition, set patterns." Finally, he said that this love must be given freely, not out of fear.

"This morality," he said, "is an ideal. At baptism we receive the seeds, and we must grow up to it through guidance and control."

"A perfection of this love is a perfection of freedom, yet there must be discipline."

To achieve a disciplined perfection of this response to God's love, man must have experience. Human love lets us appreciate a dedication to God. "Human love is meant to be a schooling to a perfect response to God," said Father Madden.

This was the second in a series of lectures presented by the department of religious knowledge at St. Michael's College.

Total cost of the March for Canada, held at the University of Toronto last Friday, was $102.73.

Personal contributions by about 15 people at the first organizational meeting totalled $21.85, leaving about $80 still to be collected.

March organizers said they feel since the purpose of the march was to involve as many campus groups as possible, these groups should share the expenses.

The Engineering Society has offered financial help, and it is probable that the Students' Administrative Council will do the same.

The Canadian - Canadian Committee would appreciate donations from other colleges and clubs which participated in order to defray the costs.

All those interested should contact Miss Reubin at 923-5921 or in the SAC office.

After discussing whether to make her travel on a separate bus, the SAC finally decided it would pacify Ole Miss if they used a bus with two toilets—one for the white folk and one for the Negro delegate who, through some unfathomable bureaucratic oversight, managed to get past the interviewers and on to the weekend exchange.

In its constant search for enthusiasm, the universal solvent of student political life, the SAC that year had scheduled several extra frisky jaunts south of the border. The council had noticed a steadily decreasing amount of enthusiasm at North Carolina and Harvard in recent years.

The trip was long, but socially a real gas. The SAC-types sang enthusiastically. Bye Bye Blackbird and White Christmas proved popular.

Finally the bus passed through a clump of sycamores and crossed the border into Mississippi.

With the warmhearted, genuine hospitality for which the South is noted, about 6,000 local inhabitants turned out to greet the bus. The SAC-types were immediately impressed by their enthusiasm and stopped.

Waving placards with warmhearted, genuinely hospitable slogans like "Nigger Go home" and "Screw You, U of T," the group began to cheer lustily. Warmhearted, genuinely hospitable snatches of traditional southern welcoming conversation could be heard:

"Here come the nigger-lovers now," yelled one man as he enthusiastically fired a shotgun at the bus. "Heat up the tar and pluck the chickens."

SAC-TYPES DIG ENTHUSIASM

The SAC-types were overjoyed at the enthusiastic, warmhearted, genuinely hospitable patter of bricks against windows. But time was short and the bus resumed its journey south.

Meanwhile at the University of Mississippi, everything was as usual. Word of the unusual cargo on the SAC bus had, oddly enough, not reached the ears of the local student leaders. Therefore the traditional, white, Sunday-go-to-meetin' hooded garments and bullwhips remained stored beside branding irons in bottom drawers throughout the unblemished flower of southern universityhood.

The battered bus limped towards Ole Miss. Student leader Orrin Snerd gave his fraternity pin a final polish and flicked a tarry feather from his shoulder as the U of T contingent began disembarking.

"Sure is good to have you-all good folks down heah to stay with us for a few days," he said enthusiastically.

"I and the othah folk heah—us good, traditional, warmhearted, genuine hospitable gents and of course, with me heah, these fine young southern belles—want to make you-all real welcome and . . .

"LAND SAKES, WHAT'S THAT THERE GETTIN' OFFA YORE BUS!!?"

A blonde, fluffy SAC girl said:

"Well, she carries herself so well . . . and she was so enthusiastic . . . and dances like a dream . . . she has such natural rhythm, you know . . . and plays the guitar and sings and drinks . . . (pant pant) and . . . oh yes, we're going to talk about segregation tomorrow after the game and before the party, and we thought she might be able to contribute something . . . sort of tell you how we do things in Canada."

Snerd winced.

MORE THAN ONE WAY TO ARGUE

He'd heard nasty rumors about how things are done in Canada. "Honey chile, belle of Toronto, I think you misunderstand us gentle southern folk down heah. We're gonna discuss segregation all right, but havin' a nigras with you . . . well, it sort of looks like you-all done made up your minds already. We were gonna tell you-all folk how to segregate."

Ole Miss students flooded into the garage as news spread. Disenchanted shouts of "burn her" filtered through the crisp, warm, genuinely hospitable southern air.

The consensus was that freedom of speech was okay, but they "wasn't gonna listen," as one spokesman put it, "to no uppity nigras that had obviously bin sent by them Commie faggots north of the Mason-Dixon line."

But the state governor Ross Barnett just back from Washington where the president had called him by his first name, decided Ole Miss should exhibit a bit more of that genuine, warmhearted you-know-what and should let the Canadian speak her peace . . .

The sun shone brightly on Ole Miss next morning as 50 students sipping juleps walked to the main seminar room. The purring of jeeps and splash of firehoses filled the warmhearted southern air as federal troops clashed enthusiastically with about 350,000 segregationists a few hundred yards away.

An occasional burst of machinegun fire interrupted Snerd as he comforted the U of T's unique delegate.

"That's right Missie, the special seminar is right under that there tree. Better give me your purty coat. Wouldn't want to spill any tar on it."

our premier

Somewhat lost in the big news Friday was the march University of Toronto students made on Queen's Park.

The overwhelming turnout contradicts the opinion held by many that university students are apathetic and uninterested in the events of their time.

The students who involved themselves in the demonstration, particularly those responsible for the organization, merit a vote of appreciation from every citizen of this country.

For his speech to Premier John Robarts and the students Doug Ward, Students' Administrative Council president, earned a position of respect and leadership unequalled by his predecessors.

Since Ward made his speech we have heard many persons express their admiration of what he had to say. With these opinions we enthusiastically agree, and offer our most sincere congratulations to one of the foremost student leaders in Canada.

Unfortunately we cannot yet say the same about Premier Robarts. Included with the praises of Ward we have heard expressions of disappointment in the way Premier Robarts responded to the students.

The Premier's reply to the brief and Ward's speech was one of condescension, composed mostly of platitudes.

This response appears indicative of Premier Robarts's attitude to the entire French-Canadian situation. Last Thursday at the Hart House Debate he tactfully avoided the whole issue, and made no reference to the Ottawa conference he now is attending.

In his opening speech in Ottawa yesterday he made no reference to Quebec, but dwelt on generalities concerning "mutual co-operation".

When he met the students Friday Premier Robarts treated them like a group of interested children whose opinions, although worth considering, required no serious attention. His attitude to the French-Canadian situation has been of a similar nature.

It is not yet too late for Premier Robarts to take Quebec seriously, but if he refuses to do so there is a great possibility he may have no second chances.

The students who marched Friday did so as an expression of support for a statesmanlike approach to the Federal-Provincial Conference. If Premier Robarts continues to sit on the constitutional fence, the next march may not be quite so friendly.

violence

Last week's assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the acts of violence which followed in its wake have produced a feeling of uneasiness in most people, particularly young people.

The assassination has tangibly demonstrated the futility of violence and the chaos one violent act can cause.

The position many now find themselves in is one of helplessness. As the implications of the assassination become increasingly more clear these feelings of inadequacy could grow.

The events of the past few days have forced everyone of us to think. Hopefully many will come to the sensible conclusion that violence accomplishes nothing but the creation of further violence.

It should be made obvious to all that their feelings of uneasiness are caused by a confrontation of the philosophies of violence and non-violence.

We suggest that the philosophy of non-violence now has particular relevance and deserves an intensive examination by all students.

Shouldn't sneer at Quebec French

by RICHARD POPE

Language is the key to a true understanding of another culture. English Canadians wishing to benefit from the wealth of our two cultures should learn French. This is sometimes rather discouraging because French is not taught as effectively as it could be. There is much room for improvement here at the U of T. For instance, many professors tend to denigrate the language spoken in French Canada. The French spoken by the educated people in Quebec is every bit as good as that spoken in Saigon, Cairo, or Marseilles. However, it is certainly true that there is a difference in accent. At U of T, we are rightly taught "received standard French", which is correct French and is understood everywhere.

However, we are only taught from the point of view of making ourselves understood. Little stress is laid on understanding others. Now, many students studying French, if they do get a chance to use it, would probably use it with French-Canadians. They will make themselves plainly understood but probably will not understand the reply given in equally correct French.

Therefore, couldn't we lay more stress on the French Canadian accent and at least make students aware of it? After all, French-Canadians don't learn Oxford English.

Here at U of T French-Canadian literature is offered for one hour a week, one term only, in fourth year as an option course; and some of the best French-Canadian writers are not treated for lack of time. There is no conflict between French-Canadian literature and French literature, and French-Canadian literature is superior to English-Canadian literature which is offered to honor French students as a one-hour-a-week course all year long. Why is this so?

comment

If modern language students were not forced to study three languages for the first two years (more than all but the gifted students can cope with) they would have a much more thorough control of two when they graduate.

At U of T some French professors lecture in English even in fourth year. This is unfair to the students. Lectures should be in French from first year up and then there would be fewer fourth-year honor French students who cannot speak French at all.

However, although competent, many professors are sorely overtaxed by our college system. As it exists now the system forces French professors to teach French courses they are not qualified to instruct in. The small colleges suffer especially. After all, some four or five professors cannot teach all drama, poetry, philosophy and novel courses in a language for all centuries.

Even professors must specialize. It is unpleasant both for a professor to teach and for a student to attend a course which that professor has never studied at a graduate level. It is unpleasant for a student to attend a course at one college, knowing that just across campus there is a professor who specializes in this course, while his own justifiably knows little about it. If the colleges must stay, then we must at least demand a pool of professors of some kind.

Is U of T utilizing all of its potential? Cannot some better system be worked out? Dare we consider change?

Carabins here this weekend

This weekend the University of Toronto will host the 15th annual Carabin Weekend.

Thirty students from U of T and University of Montreal will meet to discuss various facets of Canadian life. Discussions here will be held primarily in English, but when U of T visits Montreal in February, French will be the language spoken.

David Lewis, former New Democrat deputy leader, and Peter Gzowski, managing editor of Maclean's magazine, will address the group on the topic: "Quebec: Revolution or Evolution," and one afternoon has been set aside for student discussion.

Such discussion is a new feature and members of each group will deliver short papers on such topics as: "What is an English (or French) Canadian?" and "Can Quebec exist without English Canada?"

When the exchange program began in 1949-50 it was largely a goodwill effort. But as the Canadian-Canadian situation has become more serious, the exchange has grown in importance.

Today most university students have come to realize, along with such men as Professor Paul Fox, that it is time to concern ourselves with Quebec. Recently we have seen efforts to promote greater student awareness — for example, the recent U of T

March for Canada, and the Varsity series: "Canada in Crisis."

It has become more than ever necessary to bring French and English-speaking Canadians together, to create the understanding required if our country is to survive.

Both groups must come on equal terms to the conference table if we are to find grounds for such understanding.

Many groups, for example L'Alliance Canadienne, are attempting this with different segments of the population of Canada, but we at the university have, in the Carabin exchange, an ideal opportunity to reach an understanding of our common goals.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Not enough mourning

Having viewed and read about the events of the past "Four Dark Days", I am greatly saddened by the attitude Canada has taken towards the assassination of the late president of the U.S., John Fitzgerald Kennedy. As was pointed out yesterday in the memorial service at Convocation Hall, no country outside the U.S. could feel the impact of this tragedy more than Canada, because of the close geographical, political, economic, and cultural ties of the two nations.

Canada has been grossly lax in paying its respects to the dead president; except for the few memorial services, there has been little indication that Canadians were deeply moved by Mr. Kennedy's death.

A national day of mourning for Canada may not have been possible, but surely this university could have paid tribute by a formal declaration of mourning, and by a cancellation of all classes and campus sports events. I am ashamed of the University of Toronto's pathetic reaction to the most tragic event in recent history.
Diane Yip III Vic.

Blasts campus Reds

Sir:
Early this afternoon, as Mr. Kennedy was being buried, and even the Soviet government was paying due respect to the late president, the University of Toronto Communist Club was putting up posters on campus, asking us to vote communist in the December 6 election. Apparently there is no cease-fire in the U of T Communist camp to honor the death of so worthy a political opponent. This attitude will no doubt find reflection in the results of the Dec. 6 elections.

Kennedy worked against unreason, ignorance and hate

Following is a partial text of a speech given Monday afternoon by Prof. C. M. Craig of U of T's History Department at a memorial service for President Kennedy at Convocation Hall.

At this hour, or near this hour, people across the world are assembling in appropriate places to pay respect to the late president of the United States of America, John Fitzgerald Kennedy. It is fitting that we, the students and staff of a Canadian university, should join countless millions of whatever nationality, color of skin, religious faith or social class in paying respect on this day of his funeral.

We do this for many reasons.

First of all, we salute the president of the United States, now dead. We would do this, regardless of the personality or character or ability of the man who happened to be president, for this is a mighty office. . . . The United States is the richest and possibly the most powerful nation in the world today. The influence of that country is felt in the far corners of the globe to an extent that is unprecedented in the world's history. Through its military power, its foreign aid program, its network of alliances and through its mass media and other forms of cultural influence, that country impinges upon the rest of the world in a way that is truly extraordinary. . . .

The president of the United States is the undisputed leader and spokesman of this vast array of power and influence. He is the leader of a political party. He directs a vast executive branch. He formulates the legislative program of the federal government. He is the commander-in-chief of armed forces with unimaginable striking power.

The remarkable demonstrations throughout the world in the last few days are in part an evidence of the vast world role of the United States and a recognition that the president is the focus and centre of American power and influence.

If all this is true for people in the remote corners of the world, it is especially true for Canadians. Our relations with the United States have not always been friendly. Perhaps they have been less friendly than popular tradition would suggest. At one time or another we have worried about invasion or annexation, and more recently about economic and cultural domination. Nevertheless, the two countries have now been formal allies for nearly a quarter of a century, and we in Canada all know that our fate is intimately bound up with that of the United States. As a Canadian political leader said earlier this year, Canada and the United States are friends, whether we like it or not. Perhaps no two countries in the world are so intimately tied together. In no outside country are American events followed so closely as they are in Canada. And so in no outside country can the death of the president of the United States have quite the same impact that it has in Canada.

We mark the death of the president, but we also do so because he was John Fitzgerald Kennedy. There will be few here today who have not at one time or other felt critical of his conduct of the presidency, and certainly nothing would be more inappropriate than a sweeping and unqualified eulogy. The late president would be the first to be repelled by such treatment, for his outstanding quality was an objective intelligence. He could make as cold and candid an appraisal for his successes and failures as any of his severest critics. He could see through fulsome flattery and pretentious pomposity at a glance. We must not use them now.

And here perhaps we begin to touch on why it is peculiarly fitting that members of a university community should assemble to pay respect, for we too dislike unctuousness and insincerity and mindless verbiage. We never ceased to be amazed that a man could be a life-long politician, could win every election he contested, could win the highest office, and could yet avoid in such large measure the usual trademarks of his calling. He was a professional politician, in his bones and to his fingertips. Yet he wrote books and he read books. Sometimes, for instance, he found time to read and to write a long review, in The American Historical Review, of the first four volumes of the Adams Papers that were published a year ago.

And with his intelligence and respect for intelligence went grace and style and wit and humour, qualities that university people especially admire. Moreover, his interests were not confined to history and political science and economics. While he and his wife were in the White House, poets and musicians and artists were welcomed and encouraged as never before in American history.

Yet we have still not come to the heart of the matter, for these qualities, while attractive and compelling, are secondary in a man who held his office. Surely the reason above all that brings university people, indeed people of good will everywhere, together to seek to do him honor is the recognition that he used his great position, with increasing consistency, to favour and encourage reason, persuasion and tolerance in place of force, violence and hatred.

He had to combat intolerance, on religious grounds, when he sought the presidency in 1960, and perhaps we might recall some of his words spoken in that campaign at Houston Texas, before a group of clergymen. He said, "I believe in an America that is officially neither Catholic, Protestant nor Jewish . . . where no religious body seeks to impose its will directly or indirectly upon the general populace or the public acts of its officials — and where religious liberty is so indivisible that an act against one church is treated as an act against all. I believe in an America where religious intolerance will someday end . . . where every man has the same right to attend or not to attend the church of his choice — where there is no Catholic vote, no anti-Catholic vote, no bloc voting of any kind — and where Catholics, Protestants and Jews, both the lay and the pastoral level, will refrain from those attitudes of disdain and division which have so often marred their works in the past. . . ." Religious bigotry did not end when Kennedy was elected president, but it seems fair to hope that it can never again be as virulent as it once was.

We see the same effect to use reason and persuasion, instead of force and violence, in the realm of civil rights. This led to some criticism, that he moved too slowly, yet never before in American history was the prestige of the presidency placed so fully behind the campaign for equal opportunity for all groups and races. His favorite and oft-repeated phrase in this connection was that he wanted to get the struggle off the streets and into the courts. To those who were most disadvantaged the pace did seem to be slow, but there was a pace and it was relentless.

He sought to combat ignorance and to promote reason in the realm of international relations, and he chose a university, American University in Washington, to make one of his most important statements on foreign policy, last June. In that speech he tried to combat some widely held American views on the Cold War. He said: "What kind of peace do we seek? Not a Pax Americana enforced on the world by American weapons of war. . . I am talking about genuine peace — not merely peace for Americans but peace for all men. . . I speak of peace as the necessary rational end of rational men. . . I believe that we must re-examine our own attitude — as individuals and as a nation — for our attitude is as essential as (that of the Soviet Union)

I am not referring to the absolute, infinite concept of universal peace. . . (but to) a more practical, more attainable peace — based not on a sudden revolution in human nature but on a gradual evolution in human institutions on a series of concrete actions and effective agreements which are in the interest of all concerned." And he went on: "Let us re-examine our attitude toward the Cold War. Let us remember that we are not engaged in a debate, seeking to pile up debating points. We are not here distributing blame or pointing the finger of judgment. We must deal with the world as it is, and not as it might have been had the history of the last 18 years been different." And finally, he said, "Let us re-examine our attitude toward peace and freedom here at home. The quality and spirit of our own society must justify and support our efforts abroad. We must show it in the dedication of our own lives . . . we must all, in our daily lives, live up to the age-old faith that peace and freedom walk together. In too many of our cities today, the peace is not secure because freedom is incomplete. . . ."

And it seems fair to say this approach to public affairs was showing signs of being effective over the last several months.

Harry Truman once said that the powers of the president are exaggerated — that the only real power he has is to try to persuade people to do the things that they ought to do without needing to be persuaded. And John Fitzgerald Kennedy was at the work of persuasion, and trying to get men to be reasonable, on the last day of his life.

Kennedy's funeral quiet and dignified

By SHELDON GILBERT and DAVID SIMM

(The writers of this article attended the funeral Monday for former President Kennedy, assassinated last Friday. In this powerful eyewitness account, Sheldon Gilbert and David Simm, University College students, tell what the atmosphere around them was during the sombre services in the United States capital as a president was mourned, honored and laid to rest.)

Some will criticize the tremendous amount of publicity given to the Kennedy funeral. Everywhere during the procession there were television cameras, announcers, and newspaper photographers snapping shots of the crowd and of the Kennedy family. But it was our impression that all the distractions and incongruity created by the presence of news media did not detract from the dignity of the proceedings.

It was not uncommon to see men and women standing on Pennsylvania Avenue in reverent silence, tears in their eyes, for the almost 1½ hours during which the service was being conducted inside the cathedral. It was being piped into the street through loudspeakers.

A particularly vivid impression was that of a Negro standing close by, who stared into space without flinching once, as far as we could see, during the entire service. The very few who made loud comments were looked upon with disfavor and even indignation by the vast majority.

For us, as Canadians, it was indeed a sobering sight to see thousands of Americans, mourning with obvious heartfelt sincerity the death of their president. It was impossible for anyone to escape the sombre atmosphere and those seeking a good time moved on, not having the patience to stand in one place quietly while the service was on.

After the service in the cathedral, and following the caisson bearing the casket, came the parade of limousines led by those carrying the Kennedy family, then President Johnson, and the foreign dignitaries who had come to pay their respects. One would have thought that this would have produced an improper vitality in the crowd, but such was not the case. In fact, those who had reacted more emotionally to the funeral did not even care.

It was an amazing thing that even on this third day after the death of the president, people could still be so affected.

The most outstanding impression of all and the lasting one, was the sight of Mrs. Kennedy on her way to the cathedral, walking determinedly behind the casket veiled in black, and demonstrating to the American people an inner strength she was not supposed to have possessed. There was almost a disbelief amongst the crowd that this was the same glamorous Jacqueline Kennedy they had heretofore known.

After the funeral procession had left for the Arlington Cemetery, we went into a restaurant for lunch and the telecast from Arlington was just beginning.

It was the type of place which at any other time would most certainly have been noisy and raucous, but in the hour we spent there, the place was perfectly silent, with everyone devoting his complete attention to the television set. Not a sound came from a well-filled row of seats at the bar.

At the Arlington Memorial Bridge which crosses the Potomac River to the state of Virginia, a warm sun shone as the crowd waited for the funeral cortege.

A policeman repeatedly tried in vain to keep back spectators who were climbing the abutments of the bridge in order to obtain a better vantage point.

When a transistor radio announced that the procession was advancing on Constitution Avenue toward the bridge, cameramen atop the Lincoln Memorial, which looms above the bridge, readied themselves. The crowd settled and turned in the direction from which Mr. Kennedy's funeral procession would come. Relatively, it was all over quite rapidly.

The essence of what we had witnessed in Washington did not occur to us until much later. It was only when we visited the University of Maryland, just a 12-minute drive from the Capitol, that we were able to come to a conclusion. We quote a fourth-year student at that university who said:

"It is not so much that we have lost a president but that our president has been murdered by a product of our own society. We had thought that things like this only happen in places like Viet Nam, certainly not in America. Now we know differently, I think."

David Simm (I U.C.)

What Do You Want In A Company After Graduation?

Graduates who've been out a few years say the important things to look for in choosing a job are good training, an unrestricted chance to grow in a solid, recognized company, income, early responsibility and a stimulating environment where intelligence and enthusiasm are recognized. The points are not always in that order, but these are the main ones. What, then can Procter & Gamble offer you?

1. An outstanding record of individualized, on-the-job training.
2. Responsibilities and promotion based on a man's ability — not on how long he's been around.
3. A growth company which controls 30% — 60% of all the major product markets in which it competes; at least one of our brands is in 95% of all Canadian households.
4. Among other benefits, highly competitive salaries and profit sharing.

U of T students and Tarheelers in a seminar

By DAVE GREYSON

Despite the underlying feeling of shock and tragedy, the Tarheel exchange with the University of North Carolina was able to maintain a genuine eagerness to learn, to discuss, and to co-operate in the goal of mutual understanding.

The exchange involved 26 Toronto students, both undergraduates and graduates, who were guests of an equal number of Tarheelers.

In a five-day trip (Thursday to Monday, including travelling time) we were able to gain much insight into the views and lives of people whom we learn about from newspapers only in times of strife or scandal.

The calibre of the students we met made it quite apparent that our prejudiced views of the South needed revision.

The theme of the study was "North Carolina: Microcosm of the Changing South."

By means of lectures, round-table and informal discussions, various aspects of state and student government organization, and the changing views on the racial situation were clarified. More important than the didactic lessons learned was the great and immediate rapport which developed between the exchange groups.

Despite differences in accent, communication of ideas was easy, and a high level of understanding was gained.

Jaene Yeager and Kellis Parker, co-chairmen at University of North Carolina, ably arranged an intensive curriculum which gave scarcely a free moment. Five separate discussion sessions were arranged for the days actually spent at UNC, and we found that even under less formal conditions, one could learn a great deal by casual interrogation.

The North Carolinian is first to admit that the racial situation in the South is not good. He will admit that his own actions, and those of his father and his friends are not perfect. But he is being held back by the reactionary forces in power.

The South seems to be a world apart. Its families are old, well-established, powerful and conservative.

The student is reacting against this inertia. He is justifiably proud of his advances, even though they are slight and slow in coming.

The people there are divided among themselves. Though mostly are basically conservative, there is a growing liberal element, and the major conflict is the rapidity of the integration.

The student takes initiative in the school environment too. The former dean of students, now secretary of the Combined University told our group that "veritas" — truth is the most important object of a university education. The whole university must search for truth, and since the students tend to be a little closer to the truth, the administration must look to them.

He is given the responsibility for his own discipline, and a student judiciary system has powers of punishing offenders of the "Honor System" and the "Campus Code" which every student must comply with.

because of the aggressiveness of the student ties are maintained directly with the state officials. However, the more conservative of the government often feel that it must "ready" influence on the students. A law was railroaded through which pre-known Communist, or anyone who has the Fifth Amendment about his political affiliation speaking on the campus. It is presently a dispute from the students who realize that of speech, as well as full civil liberties must be protected.

The Toronto group noted that reform is painful in the South, we can see that progress is slow.

for President Kennedy line up outside the North Carolina Capital in Raleigh.

A bigot's mentality is a puzzling one

by DAVE GREYSON

The mentality of the bigot is a puzzle, and the ultimate basis of prejudice may never be fully understood. North Carolina, most liberal of the states in "Dixie" provides an example to the less progressive southern states, yet, by its own admission, falls short of the ideal.

Naturally, the topic of integration was of major interest in the discussion "Views of the Changing South."

To the states in the deep south, North Carolina is radical, but Roger Foushee, a graduate student in political science, admitted that the state was really conservative, and that the policy of "tokenism" tends to be a force slowing down integration.

David Dansby, one of about 75 Negro graduate students, stated that the "white moderate is worse than the Klan" in preventing integration. Active liberalism spreads integration quickly; the ultra-conservative forces a "showdown" which results in faster integration; but the moderate condescends to accepting slow changes for the sake of maintaining peace. Thus, integration follows at an illogically slow rate.

Kellis Parker, one of about 25 Negro undergraduates at UNC, and co-chairman of the exchange deplored the violence and death which results from overly exuberant integration demonstrations.

A white southern moderate offered that it has taken 100 years now, and that a few more wouldn't make too much difference.

North Carolina is far from "exuberant" in its integration policies, but the University of North Carolina has acted "as oil on the bearings" as Gerry Good said. UNC is about 25 years ahead of the state in areas of social morality, and by its efforts, has helped speed up the process throughout the state. It is the students, however, more than the university administration which push for reform.

At the university, in 1951 when a court order forced a single graduate student to be registered, he was forced to sit in the public Negro section of the football stadium. The student legislature insisted that he be given all the rights and privileges of any student, and as a result of student protest, he was more fully integrated into the university.

In 1958 Chapel Hill (home town of UNC) experienced restaurant "sit-ins" organized by the students, two years before they were common elsewhere.

Last year, a student committee investigated the reasons for low Negro enrolment, despite absence of specific policy or quotas. Extensive research disclosed that the state school board had not included names of Negro high schools on lists sent to universities for the purpose of "recruiting" students. Action has been initiated to rectify the omissions.

It has been pointed out that UNC is a more expensive institution than many, and that the low number of Negro students is partly reflected on an economic basis.

Generally speaking, it is our generation which is becoming enlightened. Many of the white students admitted that they cannot discuss integration rationally with their parents, and would be alienated if their families knew of their liberal ideas and activities.

As it stands now, Negroes are not generally permitted to hold jobs as salesclerks, waitresses and so on in white stores which have some Negro clientele. Advances in these areas are hopes for the near future.

Negroes are being held down to menial jobs, with low pay. They are the first fired and last hired, we were told. It seemed as though the white lower classes which promote the Jim Crow Laws, were trying to maintain a class which they themselves could feel superior to.

David Dansby, who presented the side of the more enthusiastic Negro integrationists, said that when a Negro fights in war for democratic rights, it seems he is fighting for the right to have a door slammed in his face. "Denial is death," he said.

Conceding that as liberals, North Carolinians are quite conservative, we can still anticipate that advances will be made. The enlightened generation, presently coming out of the universities into state government jobs provide a focus for hope.

It is likely that next year's exchange group will find an even more liberal situation.

An 'appreciation' of the RCMP

(Tim Walsh, president of the University of Toronto Communist Club, here answers statements appearing last year in The Varsity made by the then RCMP Chief Commissioner C. W. Harvison.)

By TIM WALSH

Now that ex-RCMP chief C. W. Harvison has retired as top-dog of the Red-Chasing Maniacs for Power, it seems fitting to let him know how much we appreciate him. Under his leadership, the RCMP has made so many blunders that the resulting protests have forced him to justify himself, and thus further expose the weakness of his position.

For instance, he quotes a Young Communist League pamphlet that said: "We (the league) fit in right where the action is taking place: in the high schools and universities, in debates taking place at youth clubs, the disarmament groups and the public actions that go on," and concludes: "Even the high schools are targets for Communist activities," as if the Communist Party were somehow sending agents into the high schools to subvert the students!

Apparently, it hasn't occurred to Mr. Harvison that the YCL contains high school and university students who feel that they have as much right to express their views as other students. If a young person who believes in communism debates with other students, this is Communist activity and requires a federal police force to counter-act. How sinister!

Students curious

To quote Mr. Harvison further—"University students are naturally curious. At this age, one finds a great deal of idealism and a strong sense of social morality." (Note—this makes students dangerous to the Mounties, as people with a strong sense of social morality will not tolerate RCMP intimidation) "There are certain abuses in our system . . . (such as the RCMP) . . . which a student may think communism will cure . . ." (and which the Mounties hope never will get cured) ". . . if he gets only one side of the picture."

With all the papers, radio, and TV against the Communists, Mr. Harvison is afraid that the students will only get our side of the picture! If a few Communists distributing pamphlets can out-weigh all that pro-capitalist propaganda, the capitalist system must be really indefensible!

Obviously, Mr. Harvison will not be satisfied until the students hear only his side of the picture, and if the tremendous advantage the capitalist class has in financing propaganda isn't enough, he has to intimidate people from reading our publications.

He then goes on to accuse us of trying to recruit spies here, listing several spies but completely failing to link them up with the Communists. Nowhere will Mr. Harvison be able to find evidence that the Communist program involves espionage, no matter how many spies he sends into our meetings. The use of spies has been neither mentioned in a single Communist publication nor advocated in a single Communist Party meeting.

However, spy stories do serve to scare people into submitting to restrictions on their personal freedom; hence their constant fabrication by the likes of Mr. Harvison. They also serve to justify the exclusion of Communists from government posts, although Mr. Harvison cannot prove that any Communist has abused such a post. If a Communist applies for a government position, he isn't as Mr. Harvison would have us believe, interested in spying for the Russians. It's just that even Communists have to eat, and therefore have to find work.

An individual may prefer the type of work which requires being hired by the government, and the RCMP hopes, by screening Communists from such jobs, to force people seeking government jobs to renounce communism.

But the RCMP does not restrict itself to government jobs—many employers have had visits from the RCMP concerning employees in all positions who were, or were suspected of being, Communists, and for fear of being branded a sympathizer, the employer fired the employee.

If the Mounties had their way, the right to work would be dependent upon a loyalty oath!

—vsp Feuer

Requests stoolies

To assist them in their program of putting economic pressure on students to renounce their ideas, the RCMP calls upon professors to act as stool-pigeons: "In the university community, enquiries we make into a student's background are often directed at professors . . . It would be a sad day when the security program of the country could not rely on their support."

It would be a sadder day when the students of a university could not rely upon their professors to keep confidences. Better not write too favorable an account of Marxism—the economics prof may be an RCMP spy! And don't let anybody see you reading Lenin's works in the library—you never know who is watching you. Does this sound frighteningly like Orwell's 1984?

It is the very possible consequence of statements like: "The security service would like the public to feel free to come forward with any information which they think is, or can be, subversive in nature."

The day that the RCMP longs for, when people will be looking under their beds for Mountie agents, will inform on their friends rather than risk being themselves branded, and will mind their speech instead of speaking their mind, comes closer with everyone who gives the RCMP information about anyone, with anyone who red-baits to clear his own name, with anyone who refuses to attend a meeting, to be seen publicly in the company of a Communist, to let his dissenting views be heard—for fear of RCMP reprisals.

Fascists breed

It is just this atmosphere in which fascism can breed. Fascism has always started out by attacking and isolating Communists, telling people that only the Communists were being discriminated against. Once people accept this, anybody who dissents will be labelled a Communist, just as during the McCarthy period in the U.S.A. And from there it is only a short step to outright fascism, since once the Communists are destroyed, the RCMP will attack the peace movements and the unions, then the NDP, and so on until only those who have no criticism of the status quo are left. And in case some people don't believe this could happen in Canada, read Mr. Harvison's statement: "A self-proclaimed Communist in the university does not worry us too much . . . However, these 'underground' agents who are not known as Communists can do the damage. People are not on guard and may be taken in by such a man."

In the first place, the arguments of an underground Communist are no more effective than those of the people whose disguise they are assuming, and less effective than those of an open Communist, since these people have to weaken their statements to keep from being suspected. Communists do not go underground by choice—RCMP intimidation forces them to hide their views in the hope of avoiding discrimination. Statements such as that by Mr. Harvison is an excuse to attack both those Communists who have gone "underground" and "true dissenters and radicals" by calling them underground Communists.

JFK buried — what next?

By VINCE KELLY

Will the great debate as to the relative greatness of American presidents—unleashed by JFK in his own election—be resolved now in his favour?

Prior to his death, credence was given more and more readily to the belief that Kennedy "had opened his mind, but not his heart" to the American people. While most recognized his expertise in renewing and refurbishing the tools of executive power, few saw in his efforts the resolution of the great problems that confront 20th century America.

The electronic Revolution with its urbanization of the citizenry and automation of industry, makes imperative the alleviation of both its transitional and permanent results. These results touch every facet of life—the student obtaining the technical tools which open a path to this industrialism; the intellectual developing the conceptual tools which would transform that industrialism; the worker coping with new and unwanted leisure and mobility, both unsought by him; the military juggling a weapon which could never be used.

The judgment on Kennedy will be apparent only several years hence. But some tentative conclusions are possible.

In assuming office, Kennedy by-passed a whole generation of men which might legitimately have expected the power to pass from the Eisenhower generation to it. This social phenomenon enabled JFK to capture the enthusiasm and dynamism of men touched by the social ferment of the 30s, but molded primarily by the tough pragmatism of war. Determined to use office creatively and actively, they transformed the executive into a Command HQ. This was readily foreseen, as were the inevitable conflicts with Congress. Rather than characterizing Kennedy's negotiations with the two houses as ambitious failures, the future historian may conclude that he was gradually setting the stage for a great surge of congressional activity. Bill after bill dealing with modern industrial situations have been rejected. The end result may be that Congress stands convicted of being incapable of problem-resolution and thus is prepared for the same transformation as the executive branch after Eisenhower.

To the critic, the late president's role in the Negro revolution was tangential or peripheral at best. On closer scrutiny, JFK's use of executive decree to eliminate discrimination in areas under federal supervision was undoubtedly in keeping with the "all reasonable speed" test. For the first time the massive power available to the chief executive was wielded positively, if deliberately, in the area of civil rights. Its deliberateness frustrated the critic who would have cried for all possible speed. In view of the enormous social reaction to even these tentative steps, the moves may prove to have been the maximum possible.

In fact, given the educative effect of Kennedy's civil rights bills as well, and the involvement of his attorney-general in the Negroes' strategic movements, the civil rights area may yet yield to JFK his place in American history.

Traditionally, the successful conduct of foreign affairs is more fruitful ground for assuring fame. Here again, the assassination makes his greatness depend on the fickle tide of history. With Kennedy's uneven start on first meeting Khrushchev in Austria and his smoother handling of the Cuban nuclear brink, the critic had little to go on. The nuclear test ban treaty is something else again.

All of Kennedy's talents—his public appeal, his political skills and his eloquence—were exercised to the full to negotiate this first step towards nuclear disarmament and to obtain American ratification of the treaty.

In the view of some leading Sovietologists the test ban heralded the effective end of the cold war. These experts assume the autobahn incidents—carefully prefaced by an exchange of ground rules, sanitarily fought with portable privies, satisfactorily concluded with mutual victory cries—merely to be indicators of the cooling-off process.

Couple this viewpoint with the sight of the vice-premier of the USSR walking in concert with the heads of the Western world to pay their last respects to the acknowledged leader of that world—does not the end of the cold war seem plausible?

If it is so and the thaw in East-West relation does continue, then the test ban will be truly "the first step" on "the journey of 3,000 miles." Given that set of propositions, John F. Kennedy is assured a place in the first rank of American presidents.

life. He was on his way to address a Graduate Research Center where he intended to emphasize the need for a link between leadership and learning, and he meant to say these words: "In a world of complex and continuing problems, in a world full of frustrations and irritations, America's leadership must be guided by the lights of learning and reason—or else those who confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible will gain the popular ascendancy with their swift and simple solutions to every world problem." His final warning was against fanaticism and irrationality.

The struggle to make reason and intelligence and humanity prevail over the darker forces is never done. Others now must take up the task. As we assemble here today to pay respect to the memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy, we can best do so by determining that we, too, will always speak and act against unreason and ignorance and hate.

There will be a meeting on Friday at 1 p.m. of all students interested in acting as

Death stuns Tarheel exchangers

By DAVE GREYSON

At the main door of the state capital building, Raleigh, North Carolina, no one seriously believed the first report that the president had been shot.

The moment of disbelief passed into moments of shock for both Canadian and American students. However, Tom Lambeth, assistant to the governor, choked back his emotions and began a tour of the building. A few minutes later, after he received the final word from Washington of the President's death, he had to excuse himself.

But, for the most part, the reality of the situation escaped us. It was still too new, too shocking and seemed only that a cruel foolish joke was being played.

Some stared blankly, wandered about mechanically, and said little. Some sat and wept, unashamedly.

We stood in silence as the flag over the North Carolina capital was lowered to half mast. The reality of the assassination was confirmed.

However, a government must continue, and a regularly scheduled discussion on state finance was held.

At the university, classes, concerts, parties and entertainments were cancelled. In the student union, most people silently watched T V or meditated. For most, the full impact of the situation had not reached them.

As impossible as it was that the President of the United States could be assassinated in 1963, it was true, and we shared the shock, the sorrow, and the tragedy of our hosts.

Less than 12 hours before his death, we had taken a side trip through the city of Washington.

On a mild Friday morning (2 a.m.) it was darkened, deserted and silent.

On a cooler Sunday midnight, we returned to a bright, not yet fully realized, crowded, yet still ominously silent city.

At midnight, a line of people, 10 to 15 abreast, stretched for more than 30 blocks, waiting to see the draped coffin. Yet, these hundreds of thousands were startlingly silent. Scarcely a hum rose from the slowly moving, ever growing throngs. Many wept, but most were not showing signs of grief.

It seemed a passive silence, rather than an emotional one. The sorrow we expected to find seemed subordinated by shock or curiosity.

At times, when they realized that only a small fraction who waited would ultimately get in, fearing the futility of their "death watch," some pushed to gain two or three positions forward. But this was the exception to the passive, stunned mood.

There was a peculiar feeling in the air — a feeling whose presence was so definite you could almost cut it with a knife.

The feeling was one of a monstrous, dismal, silent carnival.

I try not to distract from the profound sorrow that staggered the nation, but it was not evident in the lines at the capital on Sunday night. Harried policemen jockeyed traffic, children ran back and forth, and the air of expectancy and curiosity was evident.

"They just don't understand what this means," one Tarheeler had said about student reaction. The significance of the outrageous murder had

Dissemblers whose word can move people to rebel against any injustice of capitalism requires intimidation, justified by the Communist label. Moderate left-wingers know this only too well: just mention the word "socialism" and you're an underground agent! The RCMP will not stop at the Communists; they want your hide too.

Some apologists for the RCMP may argue that these abuses, as unpleasant as they are, are necessary to defend democracy against the Communists. They would have us believe that democracy must be destroyed to defend democracy! And the Communists do not intend to impose communism upon an unwilling majority—but rather to campaign for majority support, which is our democratic right to do, and then to form the Government, which is the democratic right of any political party which has won majority support.

Must ask for it

And the guarantee that democracy will be maintained—in fact, improved—under the Communists will lie in just the democratic spirit which is being advocated here; a people which demands democracy will get it, under any economic system. An aroused population will thwart the attempt of a would-be dictator under Communism, just as an aroused population can defend democracy right now—against the RCMP. Let the apologists for RCMP intimidation answer this question: Who was the greater threat to democracy:

the 15-year-old boy who wrote the sarcastic letter to the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press about Santa Claus being a Communist, or the Mounties who interrogated him at his school and told him that his parents were subversive, and that if he did not dissociate himself from their views, they would make it impossible for him to get any job other than a pick-and-shovel job, regardless of his education?

Democracy must be defended by demanding it, fighting for it, and being ready to make sacrifices for it if necessary. And sacrifices may sometimes be necessary. Refusing to inform on your students may make a professor look "pink." Speaking for disarmament may keep a person from crossing the border into the U.S.A. Attending a meeting may cost somebody a job.

If these chances are not taken, if people place personal security ahead of common liberty and allow threats to their personal security to immobilize them in the struggle to maintain freedom, Canada will lose the gains fought for by generations of Canadians. But if everybody stands up and speaks his mind, whether his politics be red, white, striped, or polka-dot, refusing to be hushed up by fear, and tells the government that a "thought-police" has no place in this country, then the activities of the RCMP will have to be restricted to protecting Canada from lawbreakers, which was supposedly its original raison d'être.

Boxing is staggering on the ropes, both in pro and in the colleges

Despite the pyrotechnics ignited by Cassius Clay and the millions of dollars attracted by a professional heavyweight championship match, the sport of boxing is staggering on the ropes. And where the decline of this once-thriving sport is most evident is in amateur ranks.

Boxing enthusiasm has decayed in the OQAA to such an extent that pugilists at University of Toronto can no longer look forward to a Conference Championship.

The retreat from boxing in the OQAA has been very sudden. Just three years ago Western and McGill dropped the sport from their programs, and OAC threw in the towel a year later. With this fall's announcement that Queen's will no longer field a squad, Varsity becomes an orphan.

Decline of the intercollegiate sport has mainly been attributed to the loss of prestige suffered by professional fighting. But were boxing universally like the program at U of T, knocks against the sport would be rare indeed.

Under the capable direction of veteran coach Tony Canzano, Varsity pugilists learn scientific boxing, not slugging. Canzano constantly stresses safety and protection to his charges, and he has no place on his team for the fighter who simply slugs.

Canzano drills his men for one hour five evenings a week, and it's a long grind to face without a major competition. But this grim outlook hasn't appeared to have discouraged would-be boxing Blues, and Canzano reports the largest freshmen turnout in many years.

The only other eastern North American college to have a boxing squad this year is Royal Military College, and Blues have arranged an exhibition home - and - home match with the soldiers early in the new year.

Of five Blues who won individual titles last year, only heavyweight Lou Simon has graduated. The others—Mike Rapsey (130 lbs.), Allan Anderson (135 lbs.), Ron McGregor (155 lbs.), and Norm Goldberg (165 lbs.) all return as fit as ever.

Newcomers are still welcome to work with the boxing team and a manager is also needed for background operations. Those interested may apply any evening after 5 p.m. to the boxing room at Hart House.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

PHE, Wycliffe win rugger titles by upset

By SUE TAYLOR

PHE A and Wycliffe College have topped the Division I and II rugger championships in a pair of upsets.

In Division I, PHE ended the two-year winning streak of defending champions, Vic I at the most important time with an 8-0 victory in the sudden-death final.

This season Vic I had gone 7-0 through the schedule before taking the semi-final from Meds B 3-0. PHE A had reached the final by defeating St. Mike's 14-0, earlier.

Craig Williamson and Jim McElroy made tries for the new champions while Andy Szandtner booted a convert.

Wycliffe, in taking the Division II title, also upset a previously unbeaten first-place team from Law, 3-0.

The game had a storybook finish as Denys Symons romped across the Law goal line on the final play of the game.

SOCCER

Trinity A moved into the Division I semi-finals with a 3-1 upset win over Meds A, Monday. Trinity now meets Sr. SPS.

Phil Wigley, John Mason and Mike Treadwell hit the twine for Trinity while Jordan Achiume was the lone Meds' scorer.

UC I needed ten minutes of overtime to beat SPS III, 3-2, to advance to the Division I finals. Peter Boeckle, Nick Roussanoff and Frank Felkai counted for UC, while Bill Papailias booted a pair home for Skule.

In Division II semi-final play, Monday, Architecture shut out Knox 2-0, on goals by Barry Horn and Ferdinand Walker. Architecture now meets Law in the final.

LACROSSE

Regular season play ended last night in interfac lacrosse.

St. Mike's A locked up the Group I title with a 7-3 win over PHE A yesterday as the second stringers took over for Phys Ed.

Tony Fiorini led the Double Blue with three goals while defence stalwart, George Olah, added a pair.

A 9-5 decision over Dents gave Vic I the third and final playoff spot in Group I, Dave O'Brien had four for Vic.

First place in Group II went to SPS I, which went undefeated after an 8-2 win over Pharmacy. Wayne Archer and Ron Sanderson both had three goals for Skule.

Trinity edged Knox for the Group III title as both teams registered in their final league game. Trinity took II Pre-Meds, 3-0, while Knox swamped PHE B, 12-2, paced by Grant Leishman's six-goal performance.

The Group IV title went to Vic II when Forestry climaxed a successful first season in lacrosse with a 9-5 win over SPS II. Gary Watte had a hat trick for the woodsmen and Peter Pellier scored a like number for the losing Skule squad.

Ice crew in top form before opening game

By GORD BELLMORE

With the season opener just ten days away, Varsity Hockey Blues are already in mid-season form. They have posted convincing wins in three scheduled pre-season games and another unofficial one.

Where last year Varsity was faced with a rebuilding job and a new coach, this season coach Joe Kane is established, knows the league, and has most of his players back from last season, plus several experienced rookies.

Realizing the potential of his material, Kane started right in to groom the players into a unit. He never managed to get past the experimental stage last year, but at present he is already working on the fine points in preparation for next week's busy opening. Blues play at McGill Friday, Dec. 6, and are at Queen's the following night.

Varsity's problem last year was the lack of good defence-men and Kane was forced to use converted forwards. Now, two of those converts have become effective blueliners, Peter Speyer and Bob Awrey, and the other two, Ian Sinclair and Bob Hamilton, are experienced at the position.

Speyer, one of the smallest players on the team, has been a standout this season.

Blues had no trouble scoring last year. They won't have trouble this season either. In the exhibition games, rookies Hank Monteith and Don Fuller have been scoring goals by the hatfuls and scoring stars Ward Passi and Steve Monteith are still not in shape.

Passi and Monteith were injured playing football but Passi returned against Mac last Friday and was flying. Monteith is skating hard in practice and is expected back before Christmas.

STRAY SHOTS: Blues meet Federated Colleges (OAVC) here Friday night in the last pre-season game. . . . University of Waterloo Warriors, who are in the new seven-team college league, edged Waterloo-Lutheran, 7-5, in an exhibition game Monday. Blues swamped Lutheran, 12-2, two weeks ago.

WOMEN BATTLE FOR SWIMMING HONORS

"We shall fight on the diving board, we shall fight on the starting blocks, we shall fight in the solos and in the trios, we shall fight in the synchronized; we shall never surrender."

This was the theme on Saturday as the Varsity Swimmers out-manoeuvred five other universities to capture the Women's Intercollegiate Swim Meet. It was a case of sink or swim as the girls regained the Queen's Swim trophy which they were the first to receive in 1961 and which they lost to McGill by one point last year.

Friday night saw swimmers saddened by the events of the day, but nevertheless performances were up to par.

Synchronized swimmers "wantonied with the breakers" to background music from a Hungarian Wedding Dance, an Indian war dance and various classical selections.

A highlight of the evening was Diana Crosbie's "Impressions of Sunlight", a solo routine which won her top marks.

In the trio event Miss Crosbie, Ruth Lindsay and Joan Guthrie increased Toronto's lead by their performance of "Witches of the Water".

Sara Barber churned up the foam to account for 21 of McMaster's 35 meet points, setting three racing records.

Miss Barber and Mary Lou Whitwill shared almost all individual race honors, but in spite of this the Varsity crew gained top score in the speed swimming events.

Their team effort, especially in the record 200-yard free style relay, proved that depth and intestinal fortitude rather than super stars make a team.

Members of the record-breaking relay team were captain Nancy Aston, Pat Blachford, Carol McBain and Fair Lindsay.

Miss McBain and Miss Lindsay swam outstanding individual races as well, the former winning the 50-yard free style and the latter placing a close second behind Miss Barber in the 50 yard backstroke.

But diving board antics proved disappointing for the Blue and Whiten. Gillian Davies and Judy Ireland placed third and fifth respectively behind Marion Dike of Western.

The final scoreboard read Toronto 85, McGill 73, Western 71, Queen's 52.5, McMaster 33 and OAC 29.5.

Dow Kings give Cagers first opposition after inter-squad game at Hart House

By PAUL HENDERSON

The Varsity basketball team will have its first taste of real competition today at Hart House. Blues are tentatively scheduled to meet the Dow Kings in a 5:30 encounter.

In preparation for this contest, the team played its annual inter-squad game last Thursday. Blues, led by Ed Bordas, John O'Neill and rookie Vlad Baranowicz, defeated Whites by a decisive 60-45 score.

In this preview of what appears to be an excellent squad, Bordas and Baranowicz were top scorers with 18 points.

Guard Baranowicz, who netted most of his points from long range, made a successful debut with the cagers. Versatile O'Neill hooped 16 points while sparking the winners' attack.

Whites were paced by all-star guard Dave West who showed his familiar devastating form in running up a 16-point total. Newcomer Bill Woloshyn from Western capably handled the other guard position for the losers and hit for 10 points.

Under The Basket: A rookie from Forest Hill Collegiate, Ron Kime, joined Blues for the game. . . . Nolan Kane is still nursing an injured leg and did not play, although he is now practising.

Threat of an upset looms

By AL SCHOENBORN

A few years ago, Montreal Canadiens of the NHL had wrapped up five consecutive Stanley Cups and were strong favorites to extend their record string to six. They didn't make it.

Victoria College Scarlet and Gold will be in a similar position when they take on the Double Blue from St. Michael's College in this season's Mulock Cup final at Varsity Stadium today at 1 p.m.

Vic has won the Mulock Cup five times in a row for one record and has also taken the mug 22 times all together to tie another record set by School of Practical Science. A Vic win today would establish new marks in both categories.

Vic and SPS are far ahead of other faculties in Mulock titles. The closest rivals are Medicine, which has won the silverware nine times, and University College, with seven wins. SMC has won the trophy only three times.

A look at this season's standings gives the impression that Vic is far and away the stronger team, and a prohibitive favorite. The Scarlet and Gold have not been defeated this year, finishing atop Division I with a 5-0-1 record.

But the armor is not invincible and a closer look shows possibilities of an upset. Dentistry demonstrated this during the season by holding Vic to a scoreless tie in the last regular game. And in the two meetings between Vic and St. Mike's, the Irish lost in both cases by narrow margins, 8-0 and 6-3.

It might be said the Irish still have their breaks coming to them from those two close games.

Both teams have shown powerful ground attacks but the passing is questionable on both sides.

Jim Stevenson is the Vic quarterback. Phil Rimmington, the leading scorer in the league with 33 points, is the main threat in the powerful backfield, which also counts on Ed Addison, John Bennett and basketball star Dave West.

For the Double Blues, who had a 3-3 record for second place behind Vic, Paul Dedumets is the quarterback. The Irish have possibly more speed than Vic in the backfield of John Govan, Tony Fiorini, Rick Agro and Pat Hennessey.

Each club has a top place-kicker, Rimmington for Vic and Bill Meagher for SMC.

All in all, even with Vic's impressive record, the makings are there for a tight battle. And when the breaks of fate start in motion, anything can happen.

Scoring champ

Lambert wins MVP award

There was little doubt that halfback Willie Lambert of McGill Redmen would be named the Most Valuable Player for 1963 in the Senior Intercollegiate Football League.

The 26-year-old, six year veteran of McGill football was one of the few bright spots in an otherwise dismal season for Redmen, who finished third in the senior circuit. Lambert won the league scoring title with 60 points in six games, accounting for all but 21 of McGill's points. He scored seven touchdowns, and kicked four field goals, four converts and two singles.

Regarded as one of the best pass receivers and ball carriers in Canadian college football, Wonderful Willie was chosen as an all-star this season for the fourth year in a row. He played on McGill's Yates Cup teams in 1960 and 1962 and scored the winning touchdown in the 1962 play-off game against Queen's.

The 5'8", 165-pound native of Wainfleet, Ont. is a graduate from Dentistry next spring. He intends to practise dentistry in either Montreal or Hamilton and take a crack at pro football if time allows.

Lambert is married and has two children, daughter Laurie, 3, and son Timmy, who recently turned one.

The MVP is chosen by the players in the intercollegiate league and the winner receives a handsome watch from the Omega Watch Company while McGill University holds the Omega Trophy for the next year.

All-star defender

ON CANADIAN PRESS ALL-STAR TEAM

Bryce Taylor gets nod as top defensive back

The Canadian Press Senior Intercollegiate football all-star team, released yesterday, showed only a few differences from the dream team selected by the league coaches last week.

Quarterback-defensive halfback Bryce Taylor of Varsity Blues, who just missed recognition by the coaches in the defensive backfield, was chosen in the CP poll of writers, broadcasters and coaches as the first defensive back. Taylor, a sophomore, gained 12 votes out of a possible 24.

The defensive backfield showed the most variation from the coaches' picks as Ken Davison and Gerry Sternberg of Varsity and Jim Young of Queen's joined Taylor. Sternberg and Young were also chosen on offence as they were by the coaches. Davison, the only defensive back to make both all-star teams, tied with Young for the final CP berth.

Coaches' selection, Bob Latham of Queen's and Jim Weber of Western, were not returned by the CP selectors.

The other differences on defence were the choice of Merv Daub of Queen's at middle guard and Larry Ferguson of Queen's at end. The coaches had selected Dave McCullough of Toronto at middle guard and Barry Mitchelson of Western at defensive end.

The offences of both teams were the same, except for the exclusion of halfback Bill Edwards from the CP team. The coaches had picked Edwards in a tie with Sternberg for the final backfield spot.

THE MULOCK CUP

This 69-year-old goblet is what the fuss is all about. The oldest football trophy in Canada, it was presented to U of T in 1894 by Sir William Mulock, then chancellor of the University, for interfaculty competition. The cup is four years older than the Yates Cup, emblematic of the senior intercollegiate football championship, and fifteen years the senior of the celebrated Grey Cup. Victoria College has won the Mulock 22 times, a record equalled only by School of Practical Science. Vic can win its 23rd Mulock and sixth in a row, both unprecedented figures, by defeating St. Michel's in today's final at Varsity Stadium at 1 p.m.

French profs criticize teaching method

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

University of Toronto French professors agree with Richard Pope's criticism of the teaching of French on the campus.

"Personally I think he's right," said UC Professor P. F. Dembowski, "and something should be done."

"I think that Vice-President Moffat Woodside made similar proposals a few years ago," he said.

He referred to proposals made by Richard Pope (IV UC) in The Varsity last Wednesday.

Pope called for a pool of professors in the French department, more emphasis on French-Canadian literature and some stress on the French-Canadian accent.

He told of the situation wherein a student at a small college is bored with a professor lecturing in a course he is not really qualified to teach while only a few steps across campus is a professor who specializes in that particular field.

Dr. W. S. Rodgers of Trinity College stated that he had long felt that better use could be made of the combined resources of the separate colleges.

He told of several proposals along the same line made on the administrative level of the French department. He stated that something would be done about it but admitted that he did not know how fast.

Professor P. R. Robert of UC stated that the college system worked well when the staff was small. He agreed with Dr. Rodgers that the university now is suffering growing pains and that something should be done.

All agreed that any drastic changes will be very hard to implement as long as the colleges insist on their independence.

In that case the problem simplifies itself into a political one—how to institute important changes without hurting the smaller colleges.

There are some advantages in the college system to the young professor—he is able to specialize sooner. But this is a fault if it is opposed to the best interests of the students.

All agreed that more emphasis could be placed on French-Canadian literature.

Prof. Robert stated: "It is still very young and doesn't offer very much scope but we should do more."

Dr. Rodgers said steps now are being taken to make the study of French-Canadian literature adequate.

He stated that most professors have wanted this for a long time.

In the matter of stressing the French-Canadian accent, there was less agreement with Pope.

Prof. Dembowski stated that since Parisian French is the norm, this is what is taught.

There are numerous accents and they can't all be taught. Just as in English the accent of the American South is not taught, so it is with the accent found in Quebec.

Prof. Robert said even the French-Canadians are conscious of the accents and try to reduce it as much as possible. He said Quebec radio and TV are a good example.

New College might not have a permanent teaching staff at all. Reports indicate the college might draw the best professors from other colleges.

The Communists may be poisoning the nation's wells, but democracy is safe while free-enterprising men trod the sword.

SAC yawns, governs least

By JOHN COOK

That government governs best which governs least, the Students' Administrative Council decided with a stifled yawn Wednesday night.

Deftly sidestepping controversial issues, Council ambled through a quiet three-hour session of business as usual.

The only threat to an otherwise tranquil evening was the issue of block ticket sales for the Winter Carnival Weekend shows. Council decided to debate the issue at their next meeting.

The issue was introduced by Phil Epstein (IV UC), president of the UC Lit, who termed a previous decision to sell seats in blocks "discrimination against the average student."

Finance Commissioner Larry Ward (IV Vic) pointed out that changing the policy at this time might hurt the feelings of the Blue and White Society, who has already made up its mind on the issue.

Several other highly important items were discussed in the headlong rush to adjournment. A motion to replace the word "undergraduate" with the word "student" in article VIII, Section 1, paragraph 4 of the SAC constitution received a full 15 minutes of debate.

But the constitutional amendment requires two further readings before it can be passed.

Council also: Decided to sell this year's Torontonians at $3 for the activities volume, $1.50 for the graduate volume, and $3.50 for both;

Decided to appoint another person to the Model Parliament committee to replace Richard Tan (III Meds.), who has resigned his position;

Decided to undertake two charter flights to Europe next summer at $242 return fare;

Heard a request from Global Business Associates to enter a float in the "Little Peoples Safety Parade;"

Decided to "go ahead with faith and hope there's some charity in the mail tomorrow," in the words of council President Doug Ward.

Asks curb on foreign investment

A suggestion for nationalizing primary industries such as steel, to end foreign investment in Canada was made by Vince Kelly (III Law) at a Model Parliament policy debate Wednesday.

Speaking for the campus New Democratic Party, Kelly added that revenue to support the nationalization could be at least partially supplied by the establishment of a national pension similar to the proposed scheme in Quebec.

Conservative Rick Tan (III Meds) was opposed to government intervention stronger than that of guiding. He felt Canada could find a favorable economic balance through the process of individual negotiations and compromises.

Liberal Steve Zacks (II UC) called the present concern over American investment a "product of emotionalism." He advocated a cold appraisal of facts followed by government intervention where needed. He said the Liberals felt American investment was necessary for Canada and that lack of capital ruled out nationalization as a system.

Carabins arrive ...

Union Station resounded to the strains of Le Chant des Carabins last night as 30 students from the University of Montreal were welcomed by an equal number of University of Toronto students to the SAC-sponsored Carabin exchange weekend.

After a short reception they proceeded to the homes of the Toronto exchangers for the night.

Today they will eat lunch at Alumni Hall and hear speeches by Peter Gzowski, managing editor of Macleans Magazine, and four exchangers. Discussions on French-English problems will follow.

... and Polycanns too

Twenty Engineers from Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal will be greeted at Union Station today at 5 p.m. by the Lady Godiva Memorial Band as they arrive for the second annual Polycann Exchange.

The delegates will attend the Cannonball tonight at Hart House and gala parties following.

Saturday morning a discussion on French-English problems in Canada will be attended by the Polycanns. Guest panelists include a member of the Royal Commission on Biculturalism, the assistant deputy minister of labor for Ontario, Dean McLaughlin of Engineering and representatives from the Bell Telephone Company.

After dinner in Hart House the group will attend a performance of Othello, the Cannonball, and certain jazz and folk-singing clubs.

At noon Saturday Toronto Mayor Phillip Givens will give a luncheon for the exchange at the Westbury hotel. An address by David Lewis, noted Toronto lawyer, will follow in Elmsley Hall, St. Michael's College.

Dinner, skating and partying climax the day in Nobleton, and the Carabins will stay for Sunday dinner before returning home in the evening to prepare for the arrival of the Toronto exchangers in February.

A luncheon and tours of campus will follow after which a televised version of the Grey Cup game will be watched.

A dinner, tour of Toronto and a party will follow.

Delegates return to Montreal on Sunday along with les Carabins.

All agree government must increase welfare

The federal government must become involved with social welfare to a greater extent, all parties agreed at the third model parliament debates yesterday.

Only three parties were represented at the discussion at Victoria College. The Communist party speaker was not present.

"Dignity and justice for individuals" is essential, said Mike McDonald (III SMC), representing the New Democrats. He felt that with our advanced technology and increasing bureaucracy, we can become either a "faceless automated mass" or a society making full use of our potential.

His proposals included complete medical care, extensive penal reform, improvement of hospital conditions and drug addiction clinics. He also suggested a consumers' bureau, increased interest in the housing problem and more legal safeguards for the people.

Liberal Party speaker David Runnalls (II Vic) said that although he agrees in principle with the New Democrats, he felt that the responsibilities for social welfare rested, not only with the federal government, but also with the provinces. However, this set up would occur only with the provinces' consent, he said.

He felt that medical care should be a matter for the provinces exclusively, with the aid of grants from the federal government. He also proposed a portable pension plan, contributed to by employees. This would be integrated with existing plans, on a national level.

Runnalls' final suggestion was extended unemployment insurance, with a streamlined National Employment Service, and a comprehensive re-training program.

Richard Tan (III Meds), of the Progressive Conservatives, emphasized that the main issues involved in social welfare are a medical care program and a pension plan.

"The Liberal Party's pension plan is economically unsound," he said. He also explained that until they had more facts at their disposal, the Progressive Conservatives were not prepared to present a plan of their own.

He suggested a voluntary, comprehensive health plan with a certain percentage paid by the individual. He further proposed more extensive doctor training, the removal of the 11-per-cent sales tax on drugs, and the establishment of a commission to investigate the quality of drugs.

U of T Symphony to present first concert Sunday

The year's first concert by the University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra will be presented twice this weekend.

The first performance will be at York University, Friday; the second will be at Hart House Sunday at 8:30 p.m.

Five works will be featured: the Drum Roll from Symphony 103 by Haydn; Beethoven's overture to Egmont; the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major by Bach; and Richard Strauss' Serenade in E flat.

A special contemporary work by the French composer Darius Milhaud is the fifth part of the night's repertoire. The Suite Provencale is a blend of seven dances. Its composition has been described as startlingly original and unexpected by one of the orchestra's members, Jack Bellegem.

"The suite is a mixture of 13th century French troubadour songs and 20th century complication of melody," said Bellegem.

All we need is a big Martini

The biggest ice cube in the world. Yessiree, folks, that's the Ice Palace.

The 1964 Ice Palace design contest has officially begun, and glory and honor await the college that submits the winning plan, along with two free tickets to the Winter Carnival.

Skulemen and Artsmen have been asked to unite against the Architects, who have won the contest for the last three years.

Here is what the winner gets to work with to construct his dream ice-palace: 300 blocks of ice weighing 400 pounds each, four feet long, one foot wide and three feet high; and 20 Engineers each equipped with his own yellow hard hat.

Despite the effort last year of the "campus FLQ" to blow up the Ice Palace, the Blue and White Society has decided to build the palace two weeks before the actual carnival weekend.

All designs must be submitted to the SAC office by 2 p.m., Jan. 7.

Non-violent interest grows

"People have become interested in the non-violent movement since the assassination of President Kennedy," Tom Wakiama, Canadian coordinator for the Students' Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee, said yesterday.

"Now is the time for our program to be stepped up," he said in an interview.

Mr. Wakiama proposed greater action for organizing a Toronto chapter of the SNCC.

Following soon after the formation of the first Canadian chapter at the University of Western Ontario, an organizational meeting of the SNCC will be held on this campus early next week.

Several campus clubs have already promised their full support, including the Students' Christian Movement at its recent Bala conference.

Last week Victoria College delegated Nancy Loach, liaison representative to the central co-ordinating committee of the SNCC.

On Wednesday New College named Ed Geller its college representative.

Last night Ed Greenspan, presented SNCC's case to the University College Literary and Athletic Society. Aid is also expected from the Campus Co-operative.

The Western branch has already contributed eight or nine cheques to Atlanta headquarters.

Plans for the future include a city-wide organization of the Friends of SNCC, as well as chapters at York University and Ryerson Institute.

Need to be involved

Is there a need to be politically involved?

R. A. Fenn of the U of T political economy department said Thursday there is such a need.

He told a University College lecture that in Canada there is a need for involvement in any activity at all.

The public image of politics is very diversified, he said. Some feel that it just entails political parties, others that it entails pressure groups, still others that it only involves the activities of Parliament.

While there is a need for a minority to be active in politics, many activities don't require the action of government, he said.

An example of this would be cultural pursuits. "This is one area where political parties are politically blind," he said, and cited as an example the Ontario Art Council. This council hasn't one member of the arts on it — it is entirely composed of businessmen, he said.

With regard to political involvement, Mr. Fenn stated that the extremists are the only members who are really involved. They form the party back-bone although their extreme policies are modified by the general party membership.

Rockman criticizes U of T architecture

"The University of Toronto has not recognized the importance of the visual arts, nor the importance of buildings as symbolic of the activities of the university," Arnold Rockman claimed at Hart House on Wednesday.

"Sidney Smith Hall and Massey College idealistically are failures," Mr. Rockman, noted art critic and graphic designer, told an audience at the art gallery exhibition "Recent Campus Architecture."

Rockman pointed out that both are good attempts—Sidney Smith Hall to fit into its environment and Massey College to answer the question of what buildings say to the people who use them.

But Sidney Smith Hall failed, apparently, because various of the architect's plans for color schemes and use of space were vetoed by the administration.

Massey College, on the other hand, fails because the architect has fallen into the Frank Lloyd Wright trap of assuming a God-like attitude, Mr. Rockman said, forcing the people who use the building to change their way of life.

Mr. Rockman sees this as an attack on the integrity of the individual to shape his own life.

But Massey College is a success in that it is one of the only places on campus which provides its fellows with "a place of discussion in an environment provided especially for it."

"This regard for the university as an extension of the community, with its shared values of a general humanist orientation to life and of knowledge for its own sake, has been otherwise ignored at the peril of the university.

"Whatever spaces exist on this campus are accidents," Rockman claimed. Too many things "are considered frills which should not be."

Mr. Rockman blames this on "an outdated organization in university planning. There are too many cumbersome committees. "We must have a greater organizational awareness of architecture as a humanistic art."

Mr. Rockman congratulated Trinity College and the university for commissioning sculpture for its buildings. This is a step in the right direction, although "the Gerald Gladstone sculpture on the Larkin Building is a failure—it fights with the texture and the symmetry of the building—but I am glad it has been done."

Although he noted that the administration has a great deal of difficulty with financing, and in dealings with municipal authorities and public utilities, Mr. Rockman charged that "the University of Toronto has become large and unwieldy. It now is of city size. An organizational change must take place in the face of growth."

Mr. Rockman is a well-known art critic and commentator, author of a column in the Toronto Daily Star entitled Life in the Arts and a frequent contributor to Canadian Art magazine.

He is currently working on his Master's degree in Sociology.

There was some argument against the motion on the grounds that women in residence tend to disrupt study activity, but as one student pointed out, when women are in the rooms "they don't make a lot of noise."

Bienvenu à Toronto, Carabins de l'Université de Montréal
Nous sommes heureux de vous accueillir non seulement du point de vue social, mais aussi parce qu'il y a un besoin pressant de communication entre les Canadiens anglais et les Canadiens français de notre génération.

Trop souvent autrefois nous n'avions pas profité de l'occasion de l'échange Carabin, nous nous occupant plutôt d'une série de soirées frivoles.

Cette année, pour plusieurs raisons, on ne trouvera pas la frivolité du passé. Nos invités de Montréal sont-venus à une université qui, les derniers mois, a démontré un intérêt nouveau dans les problèmes canadiens.

"The March for Canada", ainsi nommé pour représenter le nouvel esprit d'accord entre les Canadiens anglais et les Canadiens français a attiré 3000 étudiants de l'Université de Toronto à Queen's Park. Ces étudiants avaient marché pour venir à l'appui de la proposition du comité Canadien-Canadien présentée à M. Roberts.

Le jour est passé quand il y avait un petit groupe qui s'intéressait aux problèmes français-anglais.

La semaine dernière, le journal des étudiants de Laval, Le Carabin, a réagit d'une manière sceptique, au projet de la marche. Dans un article du 21 Novembre, Le Carabin a demandé, "Si nous savons gré à Richard Pope et à Doug Ward de leur initiative et croyons qu'elle représente la pensée de Canadiens anglais conscients de l'acuité du problème canadien, nous posons la question: ces deux-là, sont-ils les seuls à comprendre?"

Le succès de la marche donne une réponse retentissante à ces doutes.

Nos invités de Montréal trouveront que beaucoup des étudiants à Toronto s'intéressent à préparer la future coopération des deux nations du Canada. Cela ne veut pas dire qu'il n'y a qu'un point de vue à l'Université de Toronto, mais seulement que l'apathie du passé se remplace d'une inquiétude et d'un intérêt nouveau.

Les étudiants de l'Université de Montréal trouveront ici tous les points de vue.

Mais certainement la plupart des étudiants qu'ils rencontreront seront intéressés et indécis.

Ils sont pleins d'espoir pour un accord nouveau avec leurs contemporains Canadiens français et ils sont impatients de connaître leurs idées.

Beaucoup d'étudiants de notre université se sont rendus compte du rapport qui existe entre l'Université de Montréal et de l'Université de Toronto. Le dialogue de ces deux universités peut être très important pour fournir un bon exemple du contacte anglo-français au Canada.

Letters to the editor

Remembrance Day

This is a letter of condemnation, so please do me the honor of reading it.

Born in 1910, I remember World War I—and grew to manhood during a period of economic depression, in a large northwest English industrial city, which lasted from the end of World War I to the start of World War II.

These intervening years which, historically at least, are recorded as an era of peace, left an indelible mark on my impressionable mind. The advantages of a college education were not extended to me—not that there was anything unusual in this. Boys of working families left school at 14 years of age, after a brief and most elementary education. Nonetheless, we were not entirely stupid, not completely ignorant—a native wit and intelligence enabled many of us to see clearly the injustice and hypocrisy of so many things, social and political. Then came World War II and for six long years I was a soldier.

Right in the middle of the war, during the Libya campaign, I was privileged to have the opportunity of hearing a Sir "Somebody or other"—a distinguished politician and member of the wartime "British Council for Foreign Relations"—(I think this was the title of his group).

This political idiot told hundreds of British soldiers who were actually doing the job of fighting the Afrika Corps, and who had been detailed to attend this meeting, that Hitler was not responsible for the war, but that we were, because of our pre-war political apathy. It is one of the lesser unrecorded events of the desert campaign that his address was cut short by the vociferous indignation of the troops and the meeting broke up in disorder.

By the time I got back into civilian life I was almost 36 years of age and the sum total of my experiences of life to that date, along with hundreds of thousands like me, resulted in the election of a post-war Labor government.

The fact that they were unable to fulfil their oft-reiterated promises is something the British electorate has still to understand.

Why am I relating these things to you? Because—Ken—30 years ago I, too, thought just as you do regarding the irresponsibility of those who presume to govern and direct our affairs. You haven't said anything now, but at least you deserve the credit for having the moral courage to say it. Carlyle, Lawrence, Huxley and many other truly notables have expressed the same sentiments. If you haven't already done so, you ought to read George Santanaya's "Tipperary" from his English Soliloquies, 1922. Thus, you are in good company.

Nonetheless—I have to ask you a question. Do you propose to change, or attempt to change, the order of political, social and economic thought?

During the war, thousands upon thousands of men like myself said: "When we get back, we are going to change a few things." Did we? No—I'm sorry, Ken, we didn't. It takes men with brains and sagacity to change things, even a little. Most men of good faith try, within their narrow limitations, to introduce a semblance of sanity within the sphere of influence within which they live their lives but even so, they are so few and far between that eventually they withdraw from the unequal combat believing that Shakespeare was right when he wrote that "life is but a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury and signifying nothing."

Despite the depression of my boyhood, youth and manhood, six years of war service, followed by seven years of British post-war crisis and the last 10 years of trying to understand the system and philosophy of Canadian politics, I am sure of certain things. First—the world is quite mad; second—democracy as a political theory and philosophy bears no relation whatever to the modern practice of government; there are no great men around, in government, or in intellectual circles, to influence modern thinking and viewpoint. We are sorely in need of leadership in this direction.

Men like myself are the men Rousseau had in mind when he said that "most men lead lives of quiet desperation." We are the majority—the men who have to go to war—the men who elect the governments—the men whose souls become somewhat saddened by years of industrial servitude—we are the tail-end product of an era when education was still for the privileged few.

But we are not so blind that we cannot distinguish the true from the false. If we appear politically apathetic it is perhaps because there is no party to be enthusiastic about. We may not be able to express ourselves in lucid terms but we do have a sense of values and we are bored to distraction by modern political sophistry and the crude and dull manner with which our supposed leaders direct our affairs, whether it be in business, industry, labor relations or any level of government.

If you young men of university calibre can carry out into public life, with intelligence and sagacity, those levels of conduct which I am sure your professors urge upon you then there are many thousands of men like myself who will devotedly support you.

We badly need men of character: honest, articulate men with vigorous minds who can press into action those things which we thought we went to war to achieve, only to find that after the fighting was over and done with we had to hand the reins back to the same stupid principles of conduct which precipitated two world wars and would undoubtedly have triggered a third but for the deterrent of the hydrogen bomb.

Thanks for listening and good luck to those students who really want to introduce a little sanity into our affairs.

Yours sincerely,
W. Burke,
Fort Erie, Ont.

Expresses thanks

To the staff and students of the University of Toronto.

I can not find words to express my feelings after receiving your generous cheque. I was most deeply moved to think that you would start this fund for my children and myself. We sincerely appreciate it. I am sure that a lot of people donated to it who did not know Ron. We are very proud that he was associated with such wonderful people.

All that I can say is "thank you" and this comes from the bottom of my heart.

I am sure that if the children were old enough, they too would want to thank you. But as they are too young, I can only do this for them. The money will be used solely for their benefit. There are so many things they will need, especially now with Christmas approaching.

Again I would like to thank you for what you have done for me. It makes my load a little easier.

Mrs. Betty Mills

The lacking of humor

Humor, if timely, is always appreciated and sarcasm usually tolerated. Once more, though without his usual quality, Mr. Walker has managed to insult institutions and the people concerned with his space-consuming article.

His attack on one of SAC's more valuable and worthwhile student benefits exposes some of his own basic inadequacies, but is unfortunately also partially successful in its purpose.

As only a few of many at the university can partake in exchange weekends, it is natural that the whole student body can only benefit if full representative Varsity coverage is given. Not only is this denied, but to add insult to injury, a crude, warped and unentertaining mockery presented.

Unfortunately, this type of action appears to be typical of Varsity policy.

Free imagery in new Chinese poetry

By JOHN IP

Literature has always been a major legacy of any culture. Like history, it changes with the social background of the time, replacing here, adding there.

Long ago, Chinese Literature started on this road of change. With the come and go of dynasties and empires, there came into existence many basic forms of literary expression, not to say a multitude of schools and individuals. Some of these forms are peculiar to the Chinese heritage, while others have counterparts in various contemporary cultures.

Unfortunately, in old China the world of literature had only been accessible to a selected few, partly on account of the formidable confines that literature had reached and partly because of the wide-spread illiteracy at that time.

However, with the fall of the Manchurian Empire (A.D. 1911), social changes came thick and fast. Monarchy was abolished, feudalism just about eliminated, and the rights of education were considerably extended.

Scholars were quick to seize the opportunity to revolutionize literature. They saw, and felt, the need of a medium of mass communication which was almost non-existent before. The resultant literary movement, since known as the 'New Literature Movement', received immediate support from various circles, the foremost of which were the universities.

Magazines, novels, and journals began to appear in this 'new' language — essentially a plain man's language much more direct and vernacular than the classical Chinese. This article will be concerned with the application of this new language to poetry.

The climb by this 'new' language to poetic recognition was a difficult one. Even to the day, the 'new poetry' is still not taken for granted. This perhaps is an intrinsic disadvantage of the language. To understand why, one must know something about the classical Chinese literature.

Classical Chinese is one of the most economical forms of literary expression grammar is at a minimum, references to historical incidents and figures will convey lengthy descriptions in a few words, and nuances suggest entire spectra of interpretations.

CLASSICAL ECONOMY

In poetry, classical Chinese has found its epitome in economy of expression, while retaining the requisites of poetry everywhere. Besides, classical poetry had been developed into very rigid forms. For example, the number of words in a line, the number of lines in a poem, the rhyme positions, and the order of tones in each line are all patterned. The most noticeable characteristic, of course, is that each line almost always contains the same number of words, usually seven or five (contrast classical Chinese 'verse' which can vary in length, but then it has other formal restrictions).

The 'new poetry', on the other hand, has done away with these strict rules. Rhyme is made disposable; tone order is eliminated; and the lines can vary in length. The choice of words is much freer, and the lines are more grammatically continuous.

But it is this very code of liberation that threatens the status of this new poetry. It is debatable whether the threat is genuine, or simply the classicist's defensive attitude, which is still ingrained in many.

One important and real claim of the 'new poetry' is its increased freedom in imagery presentation. This is countered by the considerable loss in rhythm, or tonal grace — reading a work of 'new poetry' sometimes destroys it, and if the imagery is faulty the result becomes ridiculous. An analogy exists in art, where modern painting claims immortality in a cat-and-ink splash or a two-year-old's fingerwork. Such claims are rampant, but then perhaps one can look upon them as occupational hazards.

In the following paragraphs I shall endeavour to translate some representative works of well known writers in Chinese 'new poetry'. Translation has often been said to kill poetry; but until a more efficient means of communication is available it still serves its obvious function. And, of course, this presentation is meant only as an introduction, a glimpse as it were, for those who are unfamiliar with Chinese literature.

THE NEW LANGUAGE

The first author I shall introduce is undoubtedly one of the most famous: Tsui Tsi Moh. He had a good grounding in Chinese classical literature, but chose to devote himself to the 'new language'. He spent some time in Cambridge (England), which he adored, and was acquainted with the English poet Mansfield. He died in an aeroplane crash at a relatively early age. Below are two of his works: —

1. The 'pei-pa' in the lane at midnight

Again I wake, to the chords of the 'pei-pa' in the night!
Whose sad thoughts?
Whose fingers?

Like the crying wind, the sorrow rain, the drifting petals,

Rechy can't sustain portrayals

City of Night by John Rechy; Grove Press 1963; 410 pp; $7.25

By ARTHUR ZELDIN

That this book went into its fourth printing within months of its publication is no surprise. Sex, whether it is merely sensational, or integral to the vitality of a novel always sells well. City of Night, concerned with the homosexual world as seen through the eyes of a nameless male homosexual prostitute, is somewhere in limbo between these two poles of sensationalism and art.

The sordid picture of this world is unfolded with intimate detail. In well known bars and clubs, and in the streets of New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and New Orleans, the "studhustler" will always find a purchaser for his body. "Drag queens", homosexuals driven to dress and act as women, risk jail, and "marry" other men. Men pay to be beaten by young men whom they dress as motorcycle hoods or cowboys. Movie directors seduce young men with the bait of stardom. Policemen make passes at men they have arrested for homosexual offences.

This is a world of furtive, ugly sex—of "grabbing and groping" in theatre balconies, filthy washrooms, and up against trees in public parks. It is a world of the "hunter and the hunted".

Occasionally, the lurid tabloid approach is transcended by powerful portraits of real, and compelling people. Miss Destiny, the drag queen cannot merely be mocked after the narrator deftly makes plain to the reader the futility, the desperation, the pure fear of "her" life. Similar in effect is the portrayal of Skipper, who is driven constantly to drunkenness by the realization that he has sold his life, not just his body. Rechy is at his best in such portraits; his narrator addresses the reader directly in prose alive with the force of the situation, and tinged with the bitter irony of self-awareness.

Unfortunately, he cannot sustain these qualities; thus, the novel fails in many important aspects. The narrator is overly conscious of a symbolic progress towards a 'loss of innocence.' This causes him to speak of "stars hugely unconcerned", and "powerful symbolic windows", and of "Loss", with ridiculous effects.

He capitalizes in a pretentious attempt to be ominous: "...I think of my Mother... a ghost image that will haunt me—Always."

He becomes laughable by trying to create drama: "Around that time my father plunged into my life with a vengeance."

At times, by trying to recall for the reader the past, at the same time suggesting the future, he mixes verb tenses, and phrases in a 'stream-of-unconsciousness' manner which would fail any high school student.

These failures occur in those parts of the book which attempt to link in a cause and effect fashion the narrator's childhood with his present dissolution. Rechy simply cannot understand his narrator well enough, or if he can, he cannot articulate what he understands. He covers up with sham symbols and two-dimensional characters which seem to fit in with Freud's view of homosexuality and its causes. Thus, because the unifying force of the book is centred in the narrator, whose portrayal is a failure, the book fails as a novel. The attempt has been made to create artistic vitality, but shock predominates. The limbo in which the book resides is inevitable.

Thurber Carnival auditions next week

The All Varsity Revue Committee of the Students' Administrative Council has announced that 'A Thurber Carnival' will be produced in Hart House Theatre Feb. 18 to 22.

The AVR Committee is a special SAC body whose function is to choose and stage an annual production in Hart House Theatre employing the talents of students from all faculties and schools within the university. The AVR generally presents a musical drama, comedy, or revue, and while it encourages the production of original student written shows, it is not limited to them. From time to time the committee may present an established book show if good original material is lacking.

Agamemnon, the last AVR production, was staged in 1962, and was a completely student written and composed musical drama. Last year the AVR production was replaced by the Canadian Inter-Varsity Drama Festival which was, for the first time, held at the University of Toronto.

In choosing a show for this year, the Committee was faced with a dearth of original material, and consequently, The Fantasticks, a well-established off-Broadway musical was chosen. However, this show had to be abandoned when it was discovered that the Central Library Theatre had already made plans to stage The Fantasticks this fall.

In A Thurber Carnival, the AVR Committee feels it has a production of unequalled merit and one which should prove invaluable to the university's theatrical program this year. Written by James Thurber himself, one of America's greatest humour-ists, A Thurber Carnival scored an immediate success on Broadway in 1960. It is a revue in two acts, composed of a series of Thurber's best lines, readings, and skits. An evening of words and music, the Carnival successfully captures Thurber's genius for sophisticated comedy and wit, while at the same time expressing his personal feelings towards the society of his times. The whole evening is tied together by a jazz quartet, which, in the original Broadway production, was headed by Don Elliott.

The script provides excellent scope for five actors and four actresses, along with a unique opportunity for four or five amateur jazz musicians, including saxophone, guitar, base and drums.

Primary auditions are scheduled to be held in the rehearsal hall in the University College tower Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week, between 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. Interested students should select readings from A Thurber Carnival as well as from one other play of their own choice. Student jazz groups interested in the show should also apply during these hours.

In this deep night,
In this slumbrous hour, Playing the tight strings in such wild flight, Accompanying the dark, lone street.
The wane moon on the willow tree,
Ah, the half moon, how like his shattered hopes; he Wearing an open hat,
Wearing an iron chain,
Madly dancing, in the ghost streets, madly laughing,
"No more," he says, turn low your lamp,
She waits on the other side of the grave,
Waiting for your kiss, waiting for your kiss, waiting for your kiss!

2. In Sickness

In sickness I lie, in my own weary,
Watch the clouds in the sky, hear the leaves in the wind.
Is it the song of birds? The warm sun fills the courtyard, Covered with wilted grass, while vines clamber the walls,
Some scarlet, some grey,
shivering,
Soon to mingle with the earth.

Beyond the city, oh, thou Western Hills!
I have forsaken, alas, this year, thy autumn glory.
In your midst, the moon may be full and new,
At dusk who listens to the poplars sigh,
Who listens to returning birds in the cold wind cry?
Who, pray, will stroll the hillside, in solitude,
And glean a few grape twigs from the fallen leaves?
Or visit the dust-sealed altar in the Temple,
And gaze at the Golden Statue in the darkness of night?
These are thoughts in my confine; flickers of memory.

Like clouds flitting across the ripples of a lake;
Like a shadow passing a corner,
One moment it is, one moment it isn't;
Like smoke, curling high, yet broke,
Like the disordered wild geese at even-tide, Flying far into the distant hills, or turn to a trace of smoke;
Or like a shooting star on a summer night,

One sees a ribbon of dazzle, then no more;
Or like the orchid's fragrance, happily waft past—
Who can stay such fleeting grace?
Or like the tolls of a temple
bell, borne on the wind,
Some night in spring, softly rocking your half-gone dream.

The second author is Miss Tse Yuen Yin. She is at her best when writing about sentiments and affections, and has published a collection of 'letters to children'. She did some work in the United States, and her travels induced much of the tenderness in her works. The following poem describes her longing for home during a Pacific crossing:—

Paper-boats

I never could waste a piece of paper,
Always keeping it by my side,
Turn it to tiny paper-boats,
And release them to the sea.
Some are blown back to my portwindow,
Others, waveswept, cling to the bow,
But I still make them, day after day,

Still hoping, one of them will drift to its goal.

Mother, if you dream of a tiny paper-boat,
Do not be surprised;
Your daughter made it,
amid her tears,
To bring you, across the hills and the seas, her love and her grief.

Finally, a fourth poem is written by Dai Mong Shu, an advocate of free rhyme, which in other words means that rhyme is not essential but should be inserted if natural.

An Untitled Sonnet
The light rain drops on your wind-blown hair,
As pearls scattered among the green seaweed;
Or like dead fish floating on the sea,
Glistening, mysterious, sad, Tempting my green-tinted soul Towards the dream kingdom of love and die:
There the air is golden,
and the sun is purple,
There creation shed tears of joy,
How like a black cat, lean,
old,
I stretch myself in the dim light,

Show forth all my vanity and my pride, —

And still mistily stagger
after it;
Faint red wine-froth drifts among petals,
I will hide my eyes in the dark cells of memory.

To give a measure of understanding about these poems, some comments are in order. In classical poetry, the many formal restrictions limit the poem to one or two facets of the theme. But the 'new poetry', by virtue of its freedom of form, can handle a multitude of images or scenes, which together embody the theme. Take the second example above: the clouds, leaves, the city, the hills, the Temple and so on are all made to conjure up the feelings of someone confined to bed. The repetition of description insures at least some insight to the author's diffused mind. This poem, incidentally, illustrates the strong emphasis on description, which may well be the main channel of communication between author and reader.

Chansons du Canada

By JIM THWAITES

Unfortunately the bulk of French-Canadian folk-lore remains dead for most English-speaking Canadians. If we but make an effort to discover the vast number of chansons populaires de Quebec a wealth of fresh music is opened before us.

Whenever I think of the chansons, my mind turns first to tunes like: Un Canadien Errant, A La Claire Fontaine, Aupres de ma Blonde and Vive la Canadienne. The slow haunting melodies of the first two balance against the springly lilt of the last two—giving us a rough cross-section of French-Canadian techniques.

The pronounced rhythm of many of the chansons make them excellent work and dance songs. If poetically analysed however, they seem a little rough; for there often seems to have been an impatience with fitting words into the line. Minor difficulties are usually bridged by dropping relaxed 'e's' as in plut and by sounding final mute 'e's' which gives a soft, flowing quality to even potentially harsh lines. French provides great possibilities for variation of accent which is very useful here. And of course the almost over-abundance of rhyming sounds in the language proves superior to anything English.

Many of the chansons are continental French in origin; indeed, Edith Fulton Fowke claims that only about one in twenty are native to Canada. And we may see a parallel in the English North American folk tradition, for example in Burl Ives' collection of folk-songs covering the period from 1620 to 1850—a prime example being the Irish, English and American versions of Billy Boy.

But the Canadians have often done as we have in the case of songs like The Streets of Laredo—adopted and then adapted the old songs. Some have changed completely; some have merely added 'native' verses. Still others may be claimed as Canadian for they have now died out in France. And of course, as in any oral tradition, new or at least varying tunes have developed for many chansons.

The early work of collection was largely done by Ernest Cagnon in 1865, the tenth edition of his book coming out in 1955 under the title Chansons Populaires du Canada. Men like Marius Barbeau and Luc Lacourciere have carried on his work. And in 1957 Edith Fulton Fowke and Richard Johnston brought some of their work to English-speaking Canada in their own Chansons de Quebec, in which they include both the original French and a sensibly-free English translation. Either of these books will make an excellent starting place for the beginner or professional alike. For the purely oral tradition you can do no better than to start with Claude Gauthier, one of the most highly-praised of modern French-Canadian folk-singers.

Rochester led concert

By FRED CHAPMAN

There was a wide scope in the music presented at the Tri-University Concert last week, featuring the Glee Clubs of the Royal Military College, Rochester and Toronto Universities. There was also a wide span in the levels of performance.

Plagued by insecure intonation and constricted tone, the Royal Military group came into its own only in its last selection, the "Soldiers' Chorus" from "Faust." Nor did the other material arouse any notable interest, especially the "entrance and March of the Peers" from "Iolanthe." Its only value was to show just how cheap G&S really can be.

The Hart House Club was most successful in the Morley "April Is In By Mistress' Face," and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," where the almost reflective atmosphere was created by their fluid phrasing and delicate tone. Although intonation was the lack of urgency and vibrancy to their singing, resulting in a static performance for the most part. Since the technique is there, it would indicate that the problem lies not in the realm of music but more seriously in the relationship between conductor, Walter Barnes, and his chorus.

The honours of the evening belonged undeniably to the Rochester group led by Dr. Ward Woodbury. Impeccable diction, phrasing and blend were displayed throughout to fullest advantage. In the Vulpis' "Crucifixus" the completely controlled sudden dynamic contrasts brought out the double chorus effect and in Lyndol Mitchell's "St. Mark's Easter Gospel," the intensity and conviction of the work were plainly evident.

The combined choruses sang three selections, one of which was Randall Thompson's, "Last Wards of David." Here, they met the challenge of the work and gave as good a performance of it as any I have heard.

The giant screen mars a ballet tour de force

by ELAINE SILVER and RENATA MICHALOVSKY

An Evening with the Royal Ballet now playing at the Tivoli provides good entertainment for those who are especially interested in the dance.

Rarely do we find an opportunity to see two such talented artists perform together as Dame Margot Fonteyn and Rudolph Nureyev. Unfortunately, however, the medium used does much to detract from an otherwise excellent performance.

In the past, there have been several very successful ballet films—Lovers of Teruel, for example. Nevertheless, An Evening with the Royal Ballet is a poor example of this genre. On several occasions the viewer was distracted by the cameraman's cutting off a part of a dancer every time he or she did a leap. In addition, even when photographed at close range, the dancer's faces were often not in focus.

The viewer in the theatre can never see the stage and the performance in its proper perspective as a whole, unless the camera permits him to do so. Given a cameraman who is familiar with the choreography and ballet technique, it is possible to capture the beauties of dance on film.

The first number, Le Valse, opened on a misty scene of soft pinks, beiges and grays, much like a Degas painting. This airy, dream-like picture was soon disrupted by the rather noisy, discordant music of Ravel which was totally inappropriate for a waltz number. There was, however, some interesting choreography in this selection, accurately performed by a well-trained corps de ballet.

Next a—rare performance of Les Sylphides. Fonteyn in "Sylphides" is much like Rubenstein playing Chopin—that is, she seems to love and know her part perfectly; there is no tension or strain in her dancing; the sweet melodic music flows with her and through her.

Part of Fonteyn's art lies in her complete composure and dignity. Although she is forty-four, (well past the prime years of a ballerina) she has lost little in technique but rather has gained a maturity of interpretation and a gracious bearing.

It is rare for a male dancer to be able to execute the slow sustained leaps of "Sylphides" without making them heavy. Yet Nureyev, as well as having remarkable elevation, is able to land from his leaps with lightness and perfect balance.

In Le Corsaire, Margot Fonteyn showed a vivaciousness and a "joie de vivre" that depicts her love for ballet. Her enthusiasm is reflected in the perfect execution of her quadruple turns.

Nureyev, the choreographer of this ballet, again displayed the superb quality of his effortless and soaring leaps.

Although the ballet became slightly "circusy" in the end, with a succession of showy leaps by Nureyev and dazzling "fouettés" by Fonteyn, nevertheless this type of exhibition is certainly permissible for two such amazing technicians.

The ballroom scene in Princess Aurora is beautiful when done properly, but because of excessive cutting it

Gimme dat ol' time religion

By DAVID SECTER

Hallelujah! There are only two nights left for Varsity sinners to be redeemed by an old-fashioned gospel meeting. Black Nativity is a troupe of Negro singers that praise the Lord with a rousing ragtime rhythm. The congregation in the Royal Alexandra responded enthusiastically to the Christian propaganda.

Miss Marion Williams, the prima donna of the show, is a massive hunk of evangelical zeal with vocal chords to match. Her holy fervor and powerful lungs could send Lucifer scurrying off to confession.

The male lead is Alex Bradford, an ordained minister with a rich resonant voice. Princess Stewart, a blind gospel singer, chants her spirituals with rare calmness and clarity. The cast also includes the Stars of Faith, the Bradford Singers, a pianist, organist, three dancers, and narrator Ed Hall.

The show comes to Toronto after playing to ecstatic houses at the Festival of Two Worlds in Spoleto and other European capitals. Author Langston Hughes recently opened another gospel hit on Broadway, Tambourines to Glory.

Act One of Black Nativity depicts the birth of Christ in music, prose, and dance. Most of the gospel tunes are original, and traditional hymns such as Joy to the World and Oh Come all Ye Faithful are swung to a spirited jazz tempo. The stark black and white gowns of the chorus are set off by the dazzling costumes of the three wise men. A visual interpretation is offered by three graceful ballet dancers as Mary, Joseph and a shepherd. The entire show vibrates with uninhibited gusto and an abundance of talent.

The second act is a gospel meeting, with Alex Bradford as the preacher. Hand-clapping and tambourine-tapping provide a pulsating backdrop for the old-time religion. Several of the gospel stars came into the audience to instill the spirit among the natives.

Black Nativity is an exhilarating evening even if you do not buy the religion. Twenty-five songs, ranging from spirituals to ragtime, are sung with deep feeling and tremendous vocal command. Their fervor must have reached the Good Lord. Only divine intervention could inspire a Toronto audience to a standing ovation! The crowd at the special student show Tuesday evening compensated for its middling size with extra energy.

Black Nativity is Christian propaganda, but with enough sizzlemanism to make Nathan Cohen convert. Amen!

REVIEW 4

Requiem for British comedy

by DAN CALINESCU

The decline of English comedy in the past few years has been rapid and almost complete. Britain's latest entry into the Yuk-market, THE MOUSE ON THE MOON, now playing at the Hyland, is a glaring example of this rather sad fact.

The sequel to the very successful THE MOUSE THAT ROARED has absolutely nothing of the wit and zany humour of its predecessor. What could have been a very effective spoof on the nuclear arms race is nothing but a sorry concoction of clichés, seen here for the umpteenth time. The two people that might have saved the film, Margaret Rutherford and Terry Thomas, appear unfortunately in only few scenes and in those fight a losing battle against the incompetence of the script.

Who can forget the heyday of British comedy that gave us Alec Guinness in KIND HEARTS AND CORONETS? His memorable performances in LAVENDER HILL MOB and THE HORSES' MOUTH have yet to be surpassed. When we think back to THE BELLS OF ST. TRINIANS we realize that there was comedy as it should be: witty, poignant and expertly done.

Then the 'Sellers' era started. And it was obvious with the first notable performance of Peter Sellers that he was a worthy successor to Guinness. The changeover came quietly and almost unnoticed in the classic THE LADYKILLERS. Here the two masters of comedy were allowed to romp to their hearts content with the result that this film has become 'THE' British comedy of all times.

Sellers left alone in the field did well generally but he made one mistake. He worked with such fanaticism that after a few years and many, many pictures his audience began to feel 'Ho Hum, another Sellers film!' Overexposure is one of the deadliest fates that can befall an actor and the changing audience reaction cannot but negatively influence a performer's work. So it was with Peter Sellers: From the outstanding MOUSE THAT ROARED to his most recent HEAVENS ABOVE one can note a tedium that is very discouraging to an audience that came with high expectations. The other line of British comedy, more or less reminiscent of the old Mack Sennett slapstick films are of course the 'Carry On' and the 'doctor' series. The lack of good scripts after CARRY ON SARGEANT and DOCTOR IN THE HOUSE and the haphazard performing and directing made the sequels nothing but nonsense clichés. The only bright spot in these repetitious epics is the old grouch James Robertson Justice

Mention should be made of an offbeat film which thankfully was not made into a series. The lampooning of present day labour-management relations of I'M ALLRIGHT, JACK was hardhitting satire that brought the ridiculous circumstances of this very real facet of modern day life uncomfortably close. Ian Carmichael, who is perhaps the heir to the throne of British comedy, gave a very engaging performance and established himself as an actor worth watching.

The long road from KIND HEARTS AND CORONETS to THE MOUSE ON THE MOON has been mostly downhill with precious few high spots on the way. So when we hear Rutherford as the Duchess begin a speech with "MY HUSBAND AND I..." in the voice of the Queen, we hope it will be the last time. British Comedy is bound to get better—it couldn't get any worse.

Ah, sweet misery of life

By TASNEEM A. KHAN

Though life is banal, man's desire to make something of it, to be someone special, is irrepresible. In My Life To Live (New Yorker; director Jean-Luc Godard) looks at a young woman, Nana, who desperately wants to live her life and to feel it.

It starts with Nana bringing to an end a love affair that has lost its meaning for her. Like Camus' Outsider, she has a completely neutral and detached attitude to the principles of conventional society and the facade of values and rules it has built up to protect itself.

Being picked up in a cinema or sleeping with relative strangers since she cannot pay the rent of her room, she takes as matter of course. Soon she drifts into prostitution as a way of making money like any other. At first there is a moment of disgust and repulsion but soon it becomes quite natural and there is even a sense of independence and freedom of action in it.

Jean-Luc Godard, the enfant terrible of the New Wave of French directors, dazzled Europe and the world of cinema with an earlier film "Breathless", a study of another Outsider, another person whose attitude to life is completely unconventional.

In MY LIFE TO LIVE, he has made his film almost a hymn to the prostitute (played by his wife Anna Karina). Again and again the camera haunts her memorable face, sometimes with tenderness, sometimes coldly, from every angle again and again it peers at her, analyzes her, dissects her emotions, her every expression. "A chicken is an animal with an exterior and interior. Remove the exterior and you have the interior. Remove the interior and you see its soul", this is how Godard uses the camera on his prey and indeed we see the soul behind the woman. We see her in every mood ranging through coldness, despair, cruelty, pathos, love.

Mercilessly we follow her as she talks about life to a friend, "If I lift my hand, I am responsible. Whatever I do I am responsible and in this responsibility is my freedom." We see her with her clients. We see her in a moment of love with a young aesthete, "Why seek life in art. Life is in beauty," she says. Nana, as portrayed by Godard, is a woman constantly seeking something special in life and when an old philosopher in a cafe suggests the meaning may be in love, she seems almost eager to accept this solution.

Jean-Luc Godard has used some brilliant techniques in the film though some come off less well than others. Voices sometimes die out and printed words are used to emphasize the inadequacy of words to convey feelings. The images are masterly and sometimes a fade-out is made to linger almost like a memory.

In one memorable scene, while we see images of Nana in her early experiences as a prostitute, a mechanical voice coldly gives us the complete picture of the life of prostitutes in Paris.

Godard has given Nana the end of a martyr, suggesting that man's triumph over existence is perhaps only in death.

The film is a work of great beauty and a good example of the brilliant work being done by the young French directors. It is strongly recommended for serious cinema goers.

appeared disjointed. Although there is no particular story to this scene, the sudden appearance of the mediocre Russian Dance from the "Nutcracker Ballet" was disconcerting.

David Blair was a strong and dependable partner for Margot Fonteyn, but after seeing Nureyev dance, Blair appeared somewhat uninspired.

The final Mazurka was a let-down, for the otherwise graceful ballerinas in their tiaras and fluffy tutus looked ludicrous doing this foot-stomping and fist-clenching dance.

Building exhibit reflects imagination

VSP Long

One of the displays at the Hart House exhibit of campus architecture.

by PAUL RUSSELL

The new buildings rising on this campus have been a major topic of controversy for students and faculty alike for the last few years. At this stage in the game we have a good vantage point for observing what has been done so far, what has been successful and what has failed, and how the continued future development, particularly on the west campus, could be improved.

An exhibition of current campus architecture is at Hart House now until Dec. 15. The degree of imagination in the displays at this exhibition, to a great extent, reflect the degree of imagination seen in the finished buildings themselves.

The architects of the Edward Johnson Building and the Victoria College Library come out on top in the show due both to their designs and to the high calibre of their displays. The various photographs and models of these two buildings are arranged in a free design in three-dimensions on a flat, solid blue area composed of various blueprints.

These are also the two buildings, which come off best as finished architectural statements on our campus. They are both successful, not only in their designs but in the reasoned effort seen behind the disposition of both structures at their sites.

The new Victoria Library has been fitted carefully into the existing architectural setting in that section of the campus. Positive ideas concerning the use of space have been realized and employed. This is particularly true of the sunken garden area between the library and the mens residence. If these two buildings had been closer together this space would be confined and uncomfortable; if on the other hand, they had been built farther apart, the quadrangle created by the library, residence, and main administrative building would have been lost.

Compare this with Sidney Smith Hall. The building itself is competent; the architects' display is slick. However, the Arts building neither relates to the buildings around it, nor to the individuals who must inhabit it. The broad walking decks here are not nearly as attractive as the sunken area behind Victoria Library. The hall is not an enjoyable building. Students enter it with the specific purpose of a lecture in mind, then they leave immediately with an equal sense of purpose.

The place is cold, barren and uninviting. The architects do not seem to have taken into consideration the fact that they were designing a UNIVERSITY building.

Sidney Smith Hall provides no stimulation of any kind; it simply deadens.

This is true of all three buildings on the west side of St. George St. — the Arts Zoology, and Chemistry buildings; they do not relate to each other; they do not form a unified group. Each one was built as a separate entity with no thought of what would be adjoining it. The displays in the gallery for these three structures are also unimaginative.

The display for Massey College is the only one which employs architects' sketches to any real advantage. It is interesting to compare these with the photographs of the finished product. The actual building, I feel, lives up to the type of work we have come to expect from the Massey Foundation — beautiful, expensive, and a bit pompous.

I personally would have enjoyed seeing a display of material on the new Law faculty library adjoining Flavelle House. This is the most dramatic example on campus of a successful and complete integration of old and new.

A notice describing the exhibition states that the architects "were asked how they relate their buildings to the immediate environment and what their attitude was to the individuals who must inhabit their future finished products. The success or failure of the exhibition should be judged according to this approach."

The success or failure of current development on our west campus will also be judged according to this approach.

The exhibition continues at Hart House until Dec. 15.

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

The nucleus of the quarter is Place Odeon; like Paris itself, it caters to all diseases. I take a late supper the first evening at a dim grill called la petite source which specializes in sausages and chips. Then I wander across the little square; I know nothing of the cafes, yet in a lunatic frame of mind, I come to the right one: the Cafe Monaco. It is enclosed within a diagonal cut of the Rue Ecole de Medecine, shielded from the traffic of Odeon with its metro stations and luminous clock by geography and insight. A few faces are familiar, I have wandered these streets before.

I enter the place, as brilliantly lit as an extermination centre, and join the noise. Here, one orders a demi then sits forever. But the Cafe Monaco is a special kind of eternity because it is so small. It does not have the neon grandness of the Realais St. Germaine, or the deluxe tone of things ominous and unspeakable like La Pergola. Instead, it nestles like a bright bead of sweat, a crack in the wall, a slight disorder. At the bar, people are shouting and waving hopefully, at the top of a small staircase, a woman bravely readies herself for a reckless trip to the toilet, at the windows fronting the cafe proper, faces press toward the tables in pale puckers.

"You are attempting inconsistencies of which you are incapable," I intone, by way of introduction.

Nate, an accordion player with a small blue head, scratches his tattoo with some disdain and motions for me to be seated. There are three other figures at table, each one of them staring at his own eyes.

"You are Christlike to a fault," I strike again, this time at a tall gaunt figure—Hugh Brynning—who looks like an underfed gargyle.

Brynning is an amazing sight to behold; he has a huge gold earring that hangs from the side of his head like a hoop. He is a carpenter and a poet and has just returned from the sea with his friend and appendage Gordon Gilchrist. Gilchrist sits on his lap like a tiny growth. He wears the other earring. He is short and square, and I say triumphantly: "You know you look like a rectangle with an internal disorder."

But they are discussing other things; namely, their great and infamous folly of the week before. Nate, now older than most and a veteran of illusion, shakes his head sadly. Yvonne, sitting by his right hand, swings her great domestic breasts in sorrow. She is large and Danish and looks like two dwarves kissing. It is all about the fatal equation and it has ruined their hindsight. Brynning squeezes Gilchrist's elbow and he goes "peep."

"And I bought them the blasted beers," says Nate. "But I agreed with them," says Brynning, "that was the real trouble; I didn't give them a franc's worth but I said yes; Gordie too." Gordie grins like an imp, guilty but sublime. I order a round of demis to assure them of my interest, and they tell me the story in all its tragic beauty.

"Well," says Nate, "Last week two men came into the Monaco and said they had come upon it. Yvonne asked What have you come upon please? Truth, so they said, Truth proved mathematically. For a year we've worked on simplifying Truth to an equation. I am Bill and this is Will. Truth by fraction, Truth by numbers; its very possible and we almost have it. We'll make a million and live forever. Forever? asked Yvonne; yes, they said, we've just got to put it down.

"I'll admit I was interested," says Nate. "So each evening in they came with their pencils and pads, Bill and Will, writing furiously and tearing up paper—but not a franc on them, so I bought them beers the whole week and at night we went to the Cafe Tournon and I bought them sandwiches. Yvonne said to me it was amazing their love for the problem. Look at them eat and drink, she said, why we'll all live forever and be rich. She gave herself to them freely; it was very touching.

"I want to go to India," says Gordon Gilchrist, "land of mescaline and magic." Brynning slaps him tenderly on the neck. Yvonne is in sudden tears; her body quakes like an avalanche.

"Oh we believed in them," says Nate, "and then one Friday night they came in with a sheaf of paper and said We've done it, just one more decimal point and carry the two. I bought the wine and we all gathered round, it was an investment now. Bill said, You show it to them Will and Will got up from his chair and downed his wine and said Here it is and thank you friends and he threw a slip of paper on the table that said  $S/H = I/T$  and they ran out of the Monaco and into the street and nobody's seen them since."

Nate plucks at his thinning hair; he strokes his tattoo—a dark orange heart in the shape of a woman's behind.

"Awful!" moans Brynning, "lets go to the party." I tip the waiter thirty centimes, "Come along Garber," says Nate. So we walk grimly towards Gii-le-coeur, through tiny streets and down little slopes. The procession is almost funeral. Yvonne leans on Nate's arm, while Brynning steadies Gilchrist through lights and noise. "Its a hashish party," says Brynning ominously. Garber walks carefully on the balls of his feet to make sure that he falls into the right pit.

The sound of surprise A dixieland fan speaks his mind

by Phil Maude

Attention all traditional jazz fans. Our long-awaited opportunity to be heard has at last arrived, due to the fortunate absence of the regular jazz columnist.

Although I would not call Mr. Jackel bigoted, he has shown distinct unfriendliness toward traditional or "dixieland" jazz. He apparently doesn't consider traditional to be a valid jazz form. It seems necessary (to give my opinion) in defence of dixieland. And so, rather self-consciously, I must say that I think it IS jazz.

The term "jazz" supposedly originated among the negro blues and ragtime musicians of the southern United States in the late 19th century. The History of Ragtime tells us that this early negro music, and many of its musicians, became the founding fathers of traditional jazz, out of which grew the ideas of improvisation, innovation and the individual approach. Now we have what is known as "modern" jazz, if that means anything. I think even Mr. Jackel would agree that this "modern" jazz owes an immense debt to old Storeyville in New Orleans.

The word "traditional" implies adherence to a set form. That form is the melody line or tune, which is then improvised upon by the sidemen in their solos — at least this has always been the tradition.

This often encourages mediocrity. The solos tend to be mere repetitions of long-established clichés. It's unfortunate, but you can't expect everyone to be original or creative, even in present-day jazz.

Sceptics wonder what attraction traditional jazz holds that it can produce such irrational devotees. The most obvious attraction for the layman is its strong blues foundation and emphasis on warm, unsophisticated harmony.

Many of the better present-day groups such as Peterson's or Mulligan's do not baffle us by totally ignoring melody or startle us with grating discord. Anyone who has heard the mellow harmony of a Mulligan-Farmer duet will understand.

But present-day jazz often seems to be heading in the direction of esoteric professionalism. This may be the result of a society growing constantly more technical and specialized. Traditional jazz provides a refreshing contrast with its adherence to a basis laid down by a relatively simple and uncomplicated society that existed only half a century ago.

The immense popularity of dixieland among the youth of post-war Europe indicates that it is far from dead, and it won't die, because in spite of what Mr. Jackel apparently considers intellectual emptiness, it is still one of the most entertaining forms of jazz.

ON THE SCENE.

The supper set at the Colonial begins at 6 p.m. Only a few people turn up for a drink after work. There is an air of laziness as a projector casts pictures of moving clouds on the sequin-studded backdrop of the stage.

The first number, Monday Date, changed the mood. As the band warmed to their work they swung through Blue Turning Gray Over You, My Honey's Lovin' Arms and Avalon, barely able to restrain themselves. But they were happy.

Wild Bill Davison is a short, squat man about 57 years old. His hair is gray and thinning, his ears and nose are large and he has a couple of prominent chins. But when he begins to play the cornet he exudes a vitality that spills out into the audience, warming and exciting.

The notes seem to be punched out crisp and new, like mint coins. One feels that the cornet is an unwilling vessel that serves as a translator between Bill and the outside world, as he gazes through half-closed lids and pushes out the harsh yet incredibly blue tones. The cornet growls, groans, barks out the notes. Finally it too seems to acquiesce, and pleads hoarsely, seductively for fulfillment.

I talked with Salt City Six bassist Bruce Thomas between sets, and asked him about the role of traditional jazz in music today. He said that most young people like modern jazz because it's "in". "They don't listen to the 'old people'," he said, "you have to go all the way back to the beginning to understand what's new."

I asked him if dixieland was unintellectual. He said that it isn't. "Dixieland is just a different way of interpreting ideas. Some people are too dense to understand anything but rock and roll!" he added.

I stayed to hear the first evening set at 9 p.m. The noisy night crowd was trickling in, and the band was playing louder now, standards such as New Orleans, Georgia, and A Good Man Is Hard To Find. They were swinging hard and the patrons began to applaud individuals and solos, instead of furtively clapping at the end of each number.

The date has been extended one more week. Wild Bill will miss the first two days of next week due to another longstanding engagement but as he says "what the hell happens on Monday or Tuesday anyway?"

Next week's column will carry a reply to this article.

MUSIC

by DAVID S. BUNDLER

It was assumed by broadcasters that radio listeners were becoming conspicuous by their absence. It was further assumed that those remaining did so only because they were too lazy or too stupid to do otherwise. Armed with these two facts said broadcasters found a way to turn their declining popularity to profit. It was no use to attempt drama or variety shows after the advent of television; nor was it wise to gamble on appealing to the egghead element with serious music concerts or learned talk programs. The obvious solution was simply the remaining alternative: cater to the lazy and the stupid, i.e. teenagers. We should add that the coming of television did not reduce record sales as predicted. As we all know, radio did recover its ebbing strength, with a vengeance in fact, egged on by a restless youth and an idle parent-age.

In Toronto, the production of teenage noise has come to be associated with radio stations CKEY and CHUM; both are readily identifiable by decibel rating and tastelessness. But suddenly, the heavens parted and the ugly duckling delivered itself of a swan! For reasons obscure and unknown, perhaps inscrutable, CHUM entered the esoteric land of FM broadcasting. As the story goes, a small band of musician-broadcasters found a benefactor with an embarrassment of riches. We have now the incongruous spectacle of low brow and high brow noise excreted from under the very same roof.

But even more astonishing is the apparent success of this adventure. Apart from capital expenditures, CHUM-FM expects a small profit in its first year of operation, and then hopefully, a budget expansion. It accepts commercials of course, (100% sold out) but they must be short, quiet and jingle-free. Continuing expenses are not high, however, for the staff of six announcers also arranges the programs and commentary, and operates the equipment. Still, the commercial capitulation and the spartan outfittings do not seriously impair the effect of the undertaking. For eighteen hours daily, Toronto listeners can at last hear music that neither jangles their nerves nor insults their intelligence, and apparently such listeners exist in quantity to judge from the early response.

The best programs on CHUM-FM, in my opinion, are those which let the music speak for itself, and as a whole. Thus Richard Thomas' evening Concert Hall and the Sunday evening Opera are on the highest level. One might object that Mr. Thomas' tastes are peculiar or that his manner is oracular, but music is allowed to speak its piece. The same can not always be said for many of the other programs, being the familiar hodge-podge of movements and excerpts. An idea which will doubtless be used many times, is now being used on In Concert, 7-8 p.m. six days a week: all 32 Beethoven Sonatas are being played in order as recorded by Arthur Schnabel. Other such series will follow from time to time.

Jazz is not neglected, it might be added, for it is featured nightly from 11-1 p.m. Folk music has an hour to itself on Saturdays. There is even something called Spectrum which usually means plays. It was this program, incidentally, that first earned CHUM-FM its first free publicity. The station had intended presenting the original cast recording of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf, that is, until a staff member happened to listen to it. Growing fearful of the moral responsibility involved, CHUM-FM cancelled the play. Now, in the first place, for all the intellectual pretension claimed by this station it seems extraordinary that no one had even read a play that has been widely applauded, discussed and circulated for some time. In the second place it is not altogether clear how or why the station undertook to censor itself.

Clearly, the most notable feature of the play from an audience point of view was Albee's unfailing ear for language, and it must have been for this reason that it was originally scheduled. But then, to become suddenly puritanical and self-righteous seems inexplicable. Furthermore, this was a commercial recording readily available anywhere. A radio station ought to be responsible but that does not imply puerility as well.

On the subject of complaints, one must mention the low fi of the New York Philharmonic broadcasts and its decidedly offensive commentators. CHUM-FM's own announcers, as we have suggested, are not always as well prepared or as persuasive as they might like to think they are either.

Altogether, a courageous and already successful start with plenty of room for improvement.

A defence of bullfights

Bronwyn Drainie has lived in Spain for three years. She has served as the bullfight critic of an English newspaper in Spain.

By BRONWYN DRAINIE

Two kinds of tourists rampage around Europe during the summer: the Bolex-carriers and the Brownie-carriers. And both social classes flock by the thousands to the bull-fights which are held every Sunday all over Spain and Portugal. This strange species can be divided into two other fundamental categories: those who are confirmed "bullfight-ophiles" and those to whom the words "picador" and "ma-tador" become anathema after the first fight.

I do not plan to give you a clear, unbiased picture of the bullfight and then let you decide about it for yourselves.
Because no matter how many times you read on the Spanish national sport, you cannot possibly form an opinion of it until you have witnessed a bullfight. And secondly, because I am frankly prejudiced in favor of this "gory and gruesome" sport. So all you
S.P.C.A. hystericals can stop reading right now.

Let's get a few points straight — points which are often the cause of controversies and heated arguments between "aficionados" and the rest of the civilized world.

Bullfighting is an art rather than a sport. It involves a contest of forces and strategy, yes, but the outcome is completely predictable. Thus, the element of suspense is removed to a certain extent, and all attention is focused on style. An aficionado is like a connoisseur of Shakespeare or Puccini, who knows the work he is seeing backwards and forwards, and whose main interest is in different interpretations of the same work of art.

Secondly, there is no danger to the horses, except through some fluke. Years ago, the picadors' charges were unprotected, and often five or six would be killed or wounded in an afternoon. But now, all horses wear thick padding on their bodies and all they get are a few nasty bumps. They are trained to perfect obedience, and horse and man make a single, solid unit against which the bull can expend its fury and strength.

Finally, let's look at the "corrida" from the bull's point of view. "Toros de lidia", as they are called on the bull-ranches, are bred and raised for fighting—nothing more. The entire five years of their lives are spent in peaceful surroundings, on luxuriant grazing-land; here, frequent and furious clashes with their fellows bring out their natural fighting instincts, sharpen their senses, and improve their positively incredible brute force. There is a bit of the devil incarnate in every fighting bull. They weigh from a 1500 pounds to a ton. Their horns can rip a man open at a stroke. And the strongest Hercules would break his hand on the massive hump of muscle on the bull's neck.

A creature of such strength is a fully equal match for the picador's lance, the toreadors and the matador together. I would love to see any of these narrow-minded animal-lovers, who believe Spaniards are bloodthirsty because they enjoy watching men "maul a defenceless little beast to death": we'd love to see them jump down there and simply stand in the ring with one of those "defenceless little beasts" for two minutes.

If you are ever in a position to witness one of these marvellous spectacles, try to swallow whatever instinctive qualms you may have, and give it a chance. Anyone with an appreciation for artistry, pageantry, tradition and bravado will immediately grasp the inner meaning, and the half-latent Latin passion in this most mystical and fascinating of spectacles.

Stu McNeil returns to roster for final pre-season contest

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues' all-purpose, all-star veteran, Stu McNeil, makes his initial start of the season in tonight's final exhibition game against the Federated Colleges at Varsity Arena.

Medsman McNeil has been tied up with studies this fall and wasn't expected to play until after Christmas. Last night, however, McNeil said he expects to play in all games from here on.

McNeil's return is great news for Blues. But for the rest of the league it only adds to the growing dismay over the potent Varsity crew. McNeil will probably start on defence, where he was an all-star last season, with Bob Awrey moving to forward.

Further good news from the Varsity camp concerned last season's scoring champ, Steve Monteith. The rapid right winger had been working his injured ankle into shape and expects to be ready for the league openers next weekend at McGill and Queen's.

For tonight's game against Aggies, coach Joe Kane will keep Ward Passi, Sonny Osborne and rookie Don Fuller together as his top forward line. This unit impressed in last week's 5-3 win over McMaster, its first game together.

Aggies are led by former Toronto Marlboro roughneck Bob Sheffield. McMaster recently defeated tonight's visitors, 6-4.

STRAY SHOTS: The only Blue still out of action is Butch McGee, who injured knee ligaments in the first game of the season. McGee expects to have the cast removed from his wounded pin within a week. . . . Coach Joe Kane has provided Blues' Varsity Arena dressing room with all the comforts of home. The old place is now complete with new floor, new lockers, and . . . yes, music . . . Game time tonight is 8 p.m.

Matmen train for heavy schedule with three champs in the ranks

Those grunts and groans emitting from Hart House each evening aren't caused by the alumni administering the third degree on Dalt White — It's simply the noise of the University of Toronto wrestling Blues getting into shape.

Varsity matmen have been training intensely for six weeks. Under the capable direction of Coach Roger Doner, Blues have been preparing for a heavy schedule of competition this winter. So popular has college wrestling become in recent years, Varsity can look forward to meets on both sides of the border.

Blues are out to recapture the OQAA Championship, out of which they were outsmarted by the Federated Colleges last year. A week previous to last year's championship at McGill, Blues played host to Aggies in a dual meet, and handily outfought their visitors.

But the Aggies spent the following week in the steam bath, and on the day of the championship were able to wrestle a class below their normal weight. Blues lost by a slim margin.

Already Blues boast a star-studded lineup and there are several positions on the squad still to be filled. Ironically Blues have appropriated one Aggie stalwart of a year ago, 191-pound titlist Ray German.

Other former OQAA individual champs returning are two-time 177-pd. champ Don Merker, and 1962 champ John Holt.

Other veterans on the squad are Larry Angus, Bob Griffiths, and Clive Good. Expected to turn out shortly are footballers Bill Watters and Andy Szandtner.

Most promising rookie this fall has been 137-pounder Alvin McKenzie, who won Ontario high school wrestling honors a year ago.

Blues have lost only three regulars to graduation, most notably three-time intercollegiate 130-pound titlist John Stephenson. Also departed are 137-pounder Mickey X. Houston and heavyweight Hugh Cooke.

DON MERKER
177-pound champ

On the Mat: Doner succeeds another former Wrestling Blue, Rod Carrow as coach. Carrow is presently doing post-graduate studies at University of British Columbia. . . . UTTA has purchased a new vinyl-custolite mat for the wrestling room. The new mat covers the whole room, where four mats served previously.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Soccer champs retain crowns

By AL SCHOENBORN

The intramural soccer champions in both divisions have retained their titles.

SPS went undefeated to the Division I title yesterday with a 3-2 win over UC I in the final game. Skule started quickly to open up a 2-0 lead before UC was able to get untracked. Late in the game Redmen, down 3-2, had a number of glorious chances but failed to connect with anything better than the crossbar.

Joe Fulop scored twice for the champions with Oldrich Cajanek getting the other marker. Nick Roussanoff was as usual the outstanding Redman and tallied both UC goals. Ferdy Wagner's third goal of the game with one second left in the second overtime period gave Architecture its third consecutive Division II title, 3-2, over Law.

The Architecture win was somewhat of an upset as Law had finished in first place during the regular schedule.

Playoffs must be less popular at the Faculty of Law these days, as both of Law's rugby and soccer teams were upset in the final seconds of their finals after going undefeated through the regular season.

Overshadowed only by Wagner's three-goal performance was the effort of Miles Godfrey who potted both goals for Law.

BASKETBALL

Interfac basketball got underway this week.

UC I started the season on a bright note, edging defending champions St. Mike's A, 32-27. Peter Peskun, with 11 points, was high scorer for Redmen followed by Andy Birrell with eight. Bryan Ferroni led the Double Blue with eight.

UC II was also victorious by an impressive 41-19 count over Law A. Hans Tammemagi led the winners with 12 points.

Meds A edged Jr. SPS, 33-31, as Gerry Goldman and Priti Palloppson paced the doctors with eight points each.

Trinity A made it 45-38 over New. Chris Guest was high man with 17 points for Trinity while John Lazarus hooped 10 for New.

HOCKEY

UC I made it two in a row in Group I action with a 3-2 win over PHE I. Nelson Neff, Narv Glazier and Ross Davies counted for the Redmen while Bob Carson and Andy Szandtner replied for Phys Ed.

Dentistry A edged St. Mike's B, 3-2, to move into a four-way tie for top spot in Group II.

Kidd aims at fourth win in harrier

University of Toronto's Bruce Kidd seeks the fourth leg of a harrier grand slam when he competes Saturday in the US National cross-country championship at New York.

In successive weeks Kidd has captured the OQAA, Canadian AAU, and Canadian Intercollegiate harrier titles.

Tomorrow's 10,000-metre run through Manhattan's Van Courtland Park will mark Kidd's first real test since he recovered from a heel injury last summer. His major opposition should come from American six-mile record holder Pete McCordle, who holds the record for the billy Van Courtland course.

Kidd won the US title two years ago at Louisville, but passed up a defence of that championship last fall because of the British Empire Games in Perth.

Also expected to compete in tomorrow's race will be the second and third finishers in last week's CIAU championship, Chris Williamson of the University of New Brunswick, and Hylke Van der Wal of Western.

St. Mike's halfback Tony Fiorini (with ball) just bowls his way over Vic tacklers before being stopped by Ted Mitchell (44) of Vic. Vic won Mulock Cup game, 21-19. (See story, page 20).

Gymnasts are second team to suffer from inactivity

Another intercollegiate sport has been hit by lack of competition—gymnastics. The OQAA head office has been forced to announce the cancellation of the gymnastics championship, which now joins boxing on the sidelines.

Blues won the championship 132-112 a year ago in a dual meet with Royal Military College, after McGill had unexpectedly dropped out of the competition.

Now that Varsity is the only OQAA school still fielding a gymnastics team, the championship is shelved until some competitors can be found. This winter Blues' competitions will be strictly exhibition affairs.

Of last year's championship squad, Barry Brooker is the greatest loss. Brooker was forced to pass up last year's championship because of the Pan-American Games Trials in Saskatoon, but in 1962 he won all individual titles.

Returning from last year's team are Bob Smagala, Digby Sale, and Scott Griffiths. Smagala was the OQAA long horse champion last winter.

New faces on the team are Craig Williams and Barth Curley.

Blues have their first exhibition competition Saturday at Royal Military College in Kingston.

Scarlet and Gold win sixth straight Mulock Cup

Vic doesn't waste any time, that's why they're champs

By RICK KOLLINS
Varsity Sports Editor

The players on Victoria College's football team know very well that the shortest distance between two points is a straight line.

That's why today, the Scarlet and Gold of Vic are Mulock Cup champions for an unprecedented sixth year in a row while the Irish of St. Michael's are also-rans for another season.

Vic used the shortest routes possible, three long plays, to score the three touchdowns that gave them a 21-19 decision over St. Mike's in Wednesday's Mulock Cup game at Varsity Stadium. It was Vic's 23rd Mulock win in the 69-history of the goblet, breaking the record of 22 Vic had shared with Engineering.

St. Mike's learned a lesson in pseudo-mathematics from the game also; that you can move the football between the 25 yard lines from today until the fifth Friday in December, but it won't do you the least bit of good unless you cross the goal line.

It's almost impossible to conceive of a team picking up 31 first downs in one football game and still losing. But that was the fate of the Irish. They lost the ball five times on fumbles and gave up the pigskin another time by interception.

The Scarlet and Gold, on the other hand, only had 13 first downs but they utilized them to the utmost, gaining 385 yards. For St. Mike's 31 first downs, the Irish gained 405 yards, only 20 more than Vic.

The St. Mike's frustration was in evidence early in the game as the Irish moved from the opening kickoff to Vic's seven-yard line, only to fumble away the ball. Two plays, and one first down later, Vic quarterback Jim Stevenson pitched out on an option play to halfback John Bennett didn't stop running until he had crossed the SMC goal line, 90 yards away.

In the first half, when Vic established a 21-0 lead, the Irish gave the ball away four times on fumbles and once on an interception.

Of Vic's three t.d.s, the second one came off Scarlet and Gold's most sustained scoring march, 45 yards in five plays. The scoring play was a pass from Stevenson to end Eric Skeoch, covering 33 yards.

Two plays after St. Mike's lost the ball on downs late in the second quarter, Vic fullback Phil Rimmington broke away for 63 yards and the final Vic touchdown.

Rimmington also kicked two converts in the first 30 minutes and passed to end Pete Stille for another after his kick-attempt was fouled up by a bad pass from centre.

The Irish didn't lay down and play corpse in the second half, however, and they made the game exciting until the final gun. Behind the running of Rick Argo and John Govan and the pass-catching of Pat Hennessey, SMC made up the three-touchdown deficit only to lose the game on two missed converts.

Argo counted the first Irish major on a two-yard romp in the first minute of the final quarter. It took St. Mike's 14 plays to move 86 yards for the score. Vic only used nine

What else is new?

FIRST QUARTER

Victoria — After St. Mike's moved from the opening kickoff to Vic's seven-yard line, the Irish fumbled the ball and Vic recovered. Two plays later, halfback John Bennett took a pitch-out from quarterback Jim Stevenson and raced 90 yards for the first Vic touchdown. Phil Rimmington converted.

Victoria 7 St. Mike's 0

SECOND QUARTER

Victoria — Stevenson passed 10 yards to end Eric Skeoch, who then evaded a host of tacklers to run 23 more yards for a t.d. An 18-yard pass from Stevenson to Dave West set up the scoring play. Rimmington passed to Peter Stille for the convert after taking a bad snap on the kick attempt.

Victoria 14 St. Mike's 0

Victoria — After the Irish lost the ball on downs, Rimmington broke through for a 63-yard touchdown goal behind good blocking. He then added the convert.

Victoria 21 St. Mike's 0

THIRD QUARTER

No scoring.

FOURTH QUARTER

St. Mike's — In the first minute of the final quarter, St. Mike's completed an 86-yard march with Rick Argo carrying two yards for the touchdown. A pass interference penalty against Vic at the two-yard line set up the t.d. play. The convert was missed.

Victoria 21 St. Mike's 6

St. Mike's — John Govan carried five yards for a t.d. after the Irish moved 53 yards in six plays. A 37-yard gain on a pass from Paul Dedumets to Pat Hennessey was the big play in the drive. Bill Meagher converted.

Victoria 21 St. Mike's 13

St. Mike's — Dedumets passed seven yards to Tony Fiorini for the final major score. Passes to Hennessey and Jed Curtin and a 16-yard gallop by Argo set up the score. The convert was missed.

Victoria 21 St. Mike's 19

plays to move for three t.d.s.

Govan, St. Mike's' top runner in the game, scored on a five-yard run after SMC quarterback Paul Dedumets had passed to Hennessey for a 37-yard gain to set up the score. Dedumets then passed seven yards to Tony Fiorini for the final St. Mike's' touchdown with less than two minutes remaining.

Bill Meagher converted the second Irish touchdown but had no chance on the other two because of poor snaps from centre.

Notes: Fumbles and interceptions weren't the only factors breaking up the continuity of the play. A total of 194 yards in penalties was assessed, 100 yards to St. Mike's... Lee Johanson recovered two fumbles for Vic, John Perkins had an interception... Paul Lemay and Pete Stille intercepted passes for the Irish.

First annual all-star cheerleading team announced

The awesome threesome of football stars Bill (Moose) Jackson, Jim Fisher, and rugger hero Paul Wilson have finally reached a decision in their cross-campus search for the fairest belles on the inter-faculty cheerleading teams.

The trio planned for the future in selecting five freshies to their all-star squad.

University College led the squad with two members, Irene Barchuk and Mary Laende. Other members of squad are Donna Saluk (I SMC), Cathy Flavell (I Trin) and Daphne Thompson (I Vic).

The selection committee is still debating on a prize and will probably come up with some promiscuous offering.

End Eric Skeoch of Victoria evades four St. Mike's tacklers to romp for a 33-yard touchdown on a pass from quarterback Jim Stevenson in Wednesday's Mulock Cup game. Irish seen in pursuit are Vern McCreary (22) and Bill Meagher (24).

CAGERS DEFEAT DOW IN OPENER, 51-44

McElroy quits Blues

Varsity cagers won their first basketball game of the season last night, but without the services of veteran forward Jerry McElroy.

McElroy was conspicuous in a Dow Kings uniform as Blues defeated Kings, 51-44, in an exhibition game at Hart House. It was Blues' first game of the young season.

McElroy left the Varsity squad Wednesday, giving as his reason a tender left knee that has been bothering him since last season. McElroy said last night the injury won't allow him to take part in the heavy training and schedule of Blues.

"I don't know how it happened (the injury)," commented McElroy, "but now the lower part of the leg is also swollen. Playing once or twice a week with Dow won't be as hard on the leg as playing with Blues."

McElroy was always one of Blues' top scorers in his three years with the team. In his second year, 1961-62, he hooped a league-leading 230 points and his 16.5-point average earned him fourth place in that category.

Last season, McElroy slumped to 14th place in league scoring with a 10.6-point mark, but he was still a dangerous man with his one-hander.

JERRY McELROY
Injury brings end

So far this semester, McElroy's play has been below-par as he has not been in good enough condition to keep pace with the swift collegiate group.

In last night's game, captain Dave West helped Blues forget the loss of McElroy by scoring 15 points to lead all scorers. West ignored a shoulder injury suffered in Wednesday's Mulock Cup football final to contribute greatly to the victory with his alert play at guard.

Forward Ed Bordas followed West with ten points for Blues and newcomer Bill Woloshyn netted nine.

Matt Lipka was the top for Kings with nine points, most of them near the end of the game when a press by Dow caused Varsity to throw away the ball several times.

Former Varsity stars Joe Stulac, who saw limited action, and McElroy each scored six points.

UNDER THE BASKET: Nolan Kane returned to active duty for Blues and took a regular shift. But rookie Vlad Baranowicz did not play after recently suffering a foot injury in practice. He will be sidelined for about 10 days and may miss the opener against McGill here, a week from Saturday. . . . Close checking by rookies Barry Anthony and Ron Kinmel helped frustrate the late Dow drive.

Blues (51) — West (15), Bordas (10), Woloshyn (9), Anthony (4), Sheldon (4), Kane (3), Kinmel (2), Mazza (2), O'Neill (2), Quinlan (2), Andrews.

Dow Kings (44) — Lipka (9), Reynolds (9), Golding (7), McElroy (6), Stulac (6), Richman (3), Richards (2).

"Revolution or evolution" students undecided after Carabin weekend

By BRUCE LEWIS

"Quebec — Revolution or Evolution" was the theme of the 15th annual Carabin exchange with the University of Montreal, held here during the weekend.

No definite decision was reached by the 60 university students, but the three main speakers favored evolution.

After dinner in the great hall of Hart House Friday night, Warden Joseph McCulley made an appeal for reason to triumph over extremism. The voices of extremism on either side were doing Canada a disservice, he said, and should be disregarded by rational men. The university should be the centre of reason.

He recalled previous exchanges and explained that it was through personal contact like this that goodwill and understanding were maintained.

Saturday afternoon David Lewis, noted Toronto lawyer, gave a moving address in favor of Confederation and Canadianism.

He maintained that both the Montrealer and the Torontonians were, above all, Canadians. Their differences were all less important than their similarities.

Mr. Lewis complained of "raucous shrieking" from the rabble-rousers and demagogues. Canadians cannot be truly happy until this ceases, he said.

He rejected separatism as a solution to our differences. If a Montrealer comes to Toronto now, he cannot speak French, he said. But how would this be different after separatism? Isolation is impossible, and the Quebecois would experience the same difficulties then as they do now. Instead, Quebec now is beginning to catch up with the rest of Canada by using its full potential.

Peter Gzowski, managing editor of Maclean's Magazine, made the same point Friday morning. He said that the revolution is over. Quebec will now make progress through peaceful methods. The province was held back for years by Duplessis, but now it is moving forward. It does not need the additional power of independence because it does not even use all its present power.

Education was an especially important field, he said. If Duplessis had accepted federal university grants, Quebec might now have the engineers and technicians to operate its own industry.

When Bill 60 passes the Quebec legislature, the province will have the most progressive system in the country.

The rest of Canada was willing to meet Quebec halfway, he said. Would Quebec go the rest?

A new feature this year were student papers followed by extensive discussion. French-Canadians spoke most on the role of the church in education, although the Ontario students did contribute some points about the situation in Ontario. It was generally agreed that religion and school don't mix.

Allan Crosbie (IV Vic), a prospective Rhodes Scholar, spoke on the question whether Quebec could exist separated from Canada. He suggested that any province, even Prince Edward Island, could get along separately if it wanted to accept a lower standard of living. Quebec had to weigh this loss against any benefits it would obtain from independence.

Much emotional discussion was provoked by the question of what is an English-Canadian and what is a French-Canadian. Many of the Toronto students favored the merging of French and English cultures into a new Canadian culture.

But most French-Canadians opposed this and many of the Toronto students agreed with them. They wanted to maintain and strengthen Canada's two distinct cultures. One paper suggested that the provinces should be eliminated and French-Canadian rights protected by a constitutional bill of rights interpreted by a strong supreme court.

In reply, Michael McAndrew, vice-president of the University of Montreal separatists, said that this was logical for the rest of Canada, but Quebec could develop best if it were completely independent.

Everyone remarked on the friendly atmosphere of the discussions and the whole weekend. Most of the 60 participants were bilingual, but if anyone had any difficulty in one language, he simply lapsed into the other and this was accepted with goodwill by everyone.

Especially memorable, many thought, were the wonderfully cosy atmosphere of the great hall; the emotions roused by Mr. Lewis and by the discussions; and the parties of ice skating in Toronto and Nobleton.

High value was also placed on the informal discussions, whether among the exchangers or with the two staff advisers — Dr. Ramsay Cook of the U of T History Department, and Pierre Eliot Trudeau, noted Montreal intellectual.

The Toronto students will go to Montreal for a weekend in February.

Says only Americans can defend Canada

"Canada's anti-bomber fleet is no real defence against nuclear bombardment," said John Cowan (III UC) speaking for the New Democratic Party at a Model Parliament debate on defence Thursday.

He said it was true Canada could not defend herself in a nuclear war, "but no group of nations can successfully defend this continent. Only the enhancement of the American deterrent can."

The collective security offered by NATO and NORAD and approved by Cowan was knocked by Communist member Ken Dent, who called them nothing but protective screens for the United States.

He said Canadian rejection of nuclear arms would make no difference to the world picture.

"The range of the Starfighter is 500 miles, of the Bomarc 300 miles. They will explode over Canadian territory. There is no defence nuclear weapon."

Skule exchange successful

Engineered fun and discussion helped make the weekend exchange with Ecole Polytechnique of Montreal a complete success for Skule organizers and exchangers.

After the weekend, both French and English-speaking engineering students agreed in a discussion that exchanges arranged for students from compatible faculties with similar interests were the most favorable and productive.

In Toronto, the 20 ingenieurs Canadiens were treated to music and games at the Cannonball Friday, and at two parties at the Royal York Hotel

Though furniture was thoughtfully removed by hotel management, the favors of the Hiram Walker Co. put goodwill in no jeopardy.

The exchangers were treated to a spaghetti dinner at the Waverly Hotel by Bell Telephone Co., and to a buffet at the Town and Country by the Province of Ontario.

A seminar Saturday morning decided that, while uniformity was desirable for the advance of science, Canada's cultural differences were essential for aesthetic productivity and popular freedom. Executives from government and the Bell Telephone spearheaded the discussion.

Pearson to speak Friday

Prime Minister Lester Pearson will deliver an address Friday at Convocation Hall to mark the 50th anniversary of the founding of Burwash Hall and the men's residences at Victoria College.

Mr. Pearson, who graduated from Vic in 1919, is Varsity's third prime minister after MacKenzie-King and Meighen.

Admission to the address, which starts at 8:30 p.m., is by ticket only. These can be obtained by writing to Dr. E. G. Clarke, senior tutor, Victoria University, 73 Queen's Park Crescent, Toronto 5.

Ask new policy

An immediate end to a policy of "racial discrimination" in Canada's immigration laws was called for by John Bruin (III Law), NDP speaker at Friday's Model Parliament debate on immigration.

The four speakers, campus representatives of the Liberals, Conservatives, NDPs and Communists, were unanimous in advocating an open-door immigration policy with the obvious exception of known criminals.

Richard Tan (III Meds), Conservative, deplored the fact that the federal immigration minister has the power of summary deportation. He insisted that the deportee be given the right of appeal.

As for a foreseeable end to racial discrimination in the immigration laws, Bruin suggested that regrettably this would only come about when Canada's basic Anglo-Saxon attitude of racial discrimination changed.

Demand changes

A University of Toronto student, working as a tester for the Ontario Labor Committee for Human Rights, last week helped spur demands for changes in Ontario's human rights legislation.

After receiving a complaint of housing discrimination from Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Christian of Euclid Ave., who are negroes, the committee sent Judy Scolnik (III UC), a white student to verify it.

Miss Scolnik said she went to see Mrs. I. Shillaci, the owner, on the pretext of wanting to rent the apartment for friends who would be coming to town shortly. She said the landlady was showing her the place when she asked if it mattered if her friends were Negro.

The landlady replied that the apartment could not be rented to Negroes, since her other tenants would then move out.

CUP COMMENT

By BRUCE KIDD

Athletic scholarships as such are granted by few, if any, American universities. The ostensible justification for an athlete's obtaining his degree with generous financial assistance is not provided by his Saturday-afternoon skills, but is usually disguised under some more respectable head: a Canadian hockey player receives a "foreign student" grant; a football star who demonstrates "financial need" is given a lucrative sinecure by the university; a basketball prospect is awarded an "academic scholarship" because he stood within the top 25 per cent of his graduating class. Although all these forms of assistance are administered by the athletic department, they all bear a description identical to any other form of scholarships.

So when a California court ruled several months ago that football players on scholarship are really employees of the university, and thus the school is obliged to contribute to a workmen's compensation fund for the players, it appeared to open the door to the interpretation of the legitimate scholarship as being a form of employment. And in fact, last year in the United States hundreds of income tax evasion suits were taken against students on grants requiring them to perform part-time work, usually research or teaching.

But two New York court decisions in recent weeks have brought rescue to poor, starving, graduate students. In both cases the courts ruled the students did not have to pay income tax on the fellowships granted for the work.

As a result, the U.S. Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service has dropped all pending suits, and in instances where students paid tax, refunds have been made. Governments generally try to encourage graduating students to stay in school just a few years more so they can reap the full effect of the academic momentum worked up in the final undergraduate years. But not too many will stay on if they're forced to pay income tax on the grants they receive.

OUR FATHER THE BOOKMAKER

The odds against a Biblical prophecy actually occurring are 2,000,000,000,000,000 to 1. And the very slightness of the chances of such a prediction coming true is proof Biblical prophecies are divinely-inspired, for no one but God could afford to give such odds.

Such is the reasoning of Dr. Peter Stoner of Pasadena College in California. In a lecture to Ryerson students a week ago, Dr. Stoner listed several predictions which have come true: the closing of a gate in Jerusalem said to have been used by the ungodly; the decline of a rock-enclosed ungodly city called Petra; the demise of ungodly Babylon, and the disappearance of ungodly Tyre from the face of the earth.

Then Dr. Stoner produced a film to prove the validity of the prophecies: the gate in Jerusalem looks like any walled-up gate; Petra is located in an arid area of red rocks, and since trade routes shifted long ago, is relatively deserted; Babylon fell with the end of the Assyrian dynasties, and Tyre was razed by the Assyrian king Nebuchadnezzar.

But Dr. Stoner's thesis also suggests why so many Biblical predictions didn't come true—at a quintillion to one they didn't have a chance.

NOISELESS AUTOMOBILES?

A University of Alberta chemistry professor has claimed that an absolutely noiseless car is possible, and could become common a decade from now. The power for the noiseless car would come from the fuel cell, a new apparatus for producing electricity, says Professor R. N. O'Brien, and the car would need gas about as often as present cars need oil changes.

All very well, professor, but noiseless? How do you eliminate the rattle of the windows, the whine of the worn wheel bearings, the squeak of the rusty springs in most of the cars on the road today?

TRIAL BY NEON SIGN

Students at the University of Washington can easily sympathize with the humble Italian whose apartment view was blocked by a billboard of Anita Ekberg endorsing a glass of milk. Across from one of their residences, a neon sign is scheduled to be constructed: not just any old sign, but one which will be twice the height of the residence.

The colossal 80-by-96-foot sign is being built by a Seattle insurance company. Officials of the company boast the sign will be visible for four miles; it will contain 360 reflector lights, and half a mile of neon tubing. Commented a protesting student: "They have a sign now that's bad enough. Even this one goes through the drapes."

UBC AIRLIFT

Not only are the prices of textbooks at campus book-stores suspiciously high, but when the stores understock, students are generally forced to wait several weeks before their orders can be filled. But when the University of British Columbia's bookstore did not order enough copies of two Asian Studies required texts, one printed in London and the other in Tokyo, the students took direct action. They went to London and Tokyo.

One member of the class is also a navigator for a chartered airline, and on a weekend flight to London he picked up some of the texts, while a pal on the Tokyo route collected the others. They beat the bookstore order by eight weeks.

"Liberals damage Jews more than bigots"

The tale of a Jew who wanted Trinity College to love him is told in the current issue of Maclean's Magazine.

Maclean's Assistant Editor David Lewis Stein, former features editor of The Varsity and a U of T graduate, uses the anonymous Jew to exemplify the problem of "liberals" who bend over backward to "accept" Jews and therefore do all the more damage to the Jewish heritage and identity.

"It requires great nerve and wit to live as a Jew among gentiles," Mr. Stein writes.

"Sometimes your nerve can fail. Like most Jews now in their mid-twenties, I first encountered gentiles en masse in university. We came from the gilded, sheltered ghettos of the suburbs to classrooms and social circles where, for the first time, we were a real minority. Most of us fitted in easily — undergraduates tend to be very self-consciously liberal — and one boy, whom I remember particularly well because of what happened to him, tried to fit in completely.

"I'll call him Joel. At university, we called him 'the Trinity Jew.' We had been close friends in high school but when we came downtown to university he scarcely spoke to me. He took to wearing a blue blazer and grey flannel slacks and to spending all his time in the buttery of Trinity College.

"Trinity is where the wealthiest and most socially prominent Anglo-Saxons go. With their blue and white scarves trailing behind them in the wind, they look, and somehow manage to sound like brilliant English public school boys, on their way from a Mayfair cocktail party to start taking over the country. Joel fell in love with them.

"In our graduating year (1959-60), Joel was elected to student council and I was the features editor of The Varsity, the undergraduate newspaper. Another Jew, I'll call him Abe, was the editor. Abe got into a fight with the student council — they paid for the paper and were, at least nominally, our publishers — over the way he was running things and the material he was printing.

"As the fight wore on into the spring term, it turned vicious. We found out that one of the things bothering our enemies on the student council was the 'Jewish slant' in the editorials. When issues came up before the council, Joel would vote sometimes for us and sometimes against us. He was, he told us, trying to decide each question on its merits and he didn't want to let the fact that Abe and I were old friends influence him.

"Then one night when I was alone with Abe in his office, Joel came in and closed the door behind him. 'I don't care who's right or who's wrong any more,' he told us. 'It's us against them — and I'm with you guys.'

"Joel had lost his nerve. He had tried to become a gentile and had been reminded, brutally, that he was still, and always would be, a Jew."

Defence (cont.)

Dent suggested the United States would defend Canada "even if she did not want to be defended. The U.S. wouldn't let us be taken over by Russia even if we had no nuclear weapons."

Progressive Conservative Richard Tan called any Canadian disarmament "idealistic".

"It would be political suicide to advocate nuclear arms," he said.

Cowan later suggested a lighter, more mobile army," he said, "rather than immobile forces, whose weapons don't change as quickly as these immense air-borne things."

He said the Canadian army should be thought of as a force to be used outside of Canada "under the aegis of the United Nations.

"Our participation will be in the smaller and much more frequent conflicts around the world."

Cowan also mildly blasted the Canadian meek-and-mild attitude in the U.N. "We participate in all four command sections of NATO," he said, "its time we exercised a bit of the independence all the other nations get away with."

"The agreement is not sacrosanct — the Canadian people never saw many of the secondary agreements which went in with the major one, and other countries have changed them as they saw fit.

Leaders to debate

Party leaders from the four campus political parties will discuss Canadian foreign policy tonight at 8 p.m. in the Hart House debates room.

The party leaders who will form the discussion group are: Ivan McFarlane, Lib.; Rick Tan, PC; Mary Brewin, NDP; and Tim Walsh, Communist.

The discussion is under the auspices of the United Nations Club.

academic barriers

The criticisms leveled by Richard Pope at the teaching of French in last Wednesday's Varsity, and the subsequent support Pope's ideas received from the members of the French department serve to point out one of the drawbacks of the University of Toronto college system.

As the system now stands, each of the four original colleges has its own department of Classics, English, French, German, Near Eastern Studies, Philosophy and Religious Knowledge.

With few exceptions, a student taking one of these subjects is forced to take it at the college in which he is enrolled. Rarely, if at all, is a student enrolled in one college allowed to take one of these subjects at another college.

The faults of the college system, in relation to the courses taught by the colleges, can be criticized from two points of view.

Pope's criticism was based on the inefficiency of the system and the results of such inefficiency. For example, each college in setting up a French department must acquire lecturers for each aspect of a course in French.

This, of course, results in a quadruplication of lecturers, which is not necessarily bad when we consider the value of small classes taught by specialists in these subjects.

But as Pope has pointed out, such specialization does not exist. Rather, each member of the department is required to teach more than one of these subjects. This results in a lecturer, who has a specialized knowledge, say, of French drama, being forced to teach French philosophy. He has done no extensive academic work in philosophy, and as a result is not able to provide his students with any worthwhile instruction in the subject.

However the students in his class may know that within the French department of another college there is a lecturer with the ability and qualifications to teach French philosophy. But the barriers of the college system prevent them from taking advantage of this.

One solution to this problem is cross appointments of the teaching staff. The other is to allow students to take particular subjects in another college.

The second critical approach is far more serious, for it involves academic freedom. It is particularly applicable in the philosophy and religious knowledge departments.

If philosophy and religious knowledge courses were the same in all colleges, the encroachments on academic freedom would not exist, although the first critical argument would still apply.

However each of the three colleges which offer religious knowledge courses teach these courses from a different point of view, and consequently the courses are of different content.

Presumably the university is an institution devoted to the process of free rational inquiry. If this process is to be honestly carried out, any barriers must restrict academic freedom. If the university is to accept any thing as a "truth" upon which it bases its administrative decisions, this "truth" must have the agreement of all rational men.

Obviously all rational men do not agree on religion, or we would not have three church-affiliated colleges.

The most glaring encroachment on academic freedom exists in St. Michael's College, particularly in the teaching of philosophy. Not only are students prevented from taking courses in another college, but they are also prevented from reading certain books and coming into contact with certain ideas.

If students wish to enroll in a college with the full knowledge and desire that their studies in religious knowledge and philosophy will be restricted, that is their business.

But if students in these colleges wish to investigate subjects their college refuses them, the matter becomes one of academic freedom.

The solution in this case must lie in either eliminating the partisan approach to knowledge and creating university-wide departments of religious knowledge and philosophy, or in allowing students to take subjects in colleges other than the one in which they are enrolled.

Memos from the pit

By KEN DRUSHKA

Political action can be motivated in two ways. Actions can be carried out with the sole purpose of attaining a specific end; or action can originate from a moral principle which has worth in itself, even though it may lead to the same end.

In the first method a politician must initially decide what the desired end is; and then he must decide on actions which will achieve this end, even if those actions are in conflict with the desired end.

But the politician whose actions are based on a moral principle will not consider the ends. In a given situation he will act, not as his desires or hopes dictate, but as his principles tell him he should. He will act in this manner no matter what the ends of such actions might be.

The actions of both politicians will have principles, but the difference between the two will be that the moral politician will be aware of—and acting from—his principle. The politician who is intent on the end will either not be aware of the principle, or will choose to violate it.

It should be obvious that Western politics, including Canadian politics, are conducted by and large with the end, rather than the moral beginning, as the basis for action.

This claim is well illustrated in an examination of the principles underlying Canadian defence policies.

The recognized objective of the Canadian political leaders is peace. No rational man would claim they are intent on bringing about a war. But the actions directed toward their end are difficult to differentiate from a policy of war, and therefore are open to question.

The underlying principle of peace is that killing and war are morally wrong. The man who begins with this precept will, therefore, undertake no action which leads toward war.

He will not carry a big stick, because he knows that in carrying the big stick he implies that he will use it, which is a violation of his principle.

On the other hand, the man who has only peace as a desirable end may decide that if he carries a stick—or equips himself with nuclear weapons—he eventually will be able to attain peace.

But the important point with this man is that he is not committed to peace. He believes it is wrong to kill, but is prepared to kill to prevent killing.

An action has moral worth only when it is carried out on the basis of a moral precept. For example, the man who refrains from stealing because he is afraid of being caught and punished is not acting morally. However, if he does not steal because his principles tell him he should not steal, he is acting morally.

Similarly, the man who carries a big stick is not acting morally. He either intends to use the stick, in which case he intends to kill; or he is prepared to kill if he finds it necessary. In either case he does not follow the moral principle: Thou shalt not kill.

When the man whose moral principles dictates that he shall not kill finds that others around him are carrying sticks and arming themselves with nuclear weapons he is faced with the responsibility of attempting to return them to a sane course.

Because he believes it morally wrong to kill, he will discount their entreaties to arm himself in order to maintain the peace. Nor will he speak of "honoring the nuclear commitments" made by his predecessors. If he does he will violate his moral principle that killing is wrong.

Rather, he will realize that in addition to belonging to a national social unit, he is also a member of an international unit. His responsibility then becomes one of persuading the other national units to accept his moral precept that killing is wrong.

But the man who is not a moral politician will arm himself. He will tell the citizens who come under his jurisdiction that he is trying to achieve peace, but that it is necessary to carry a big stick to attain and keep this peace.

Venez au Varsity weekend

By JIM THWAITES

"N. B.—L'Association generale des Etudiants a coupe le budget de moitié . . . ce qui garantit le sérieux du Varsity cette année."

That's the way the ad in Le Quartier Latin, the University of Montreal's student newspaper, read. And it sounds strangely like an apology—or not so strangely, perhaps, if the Canadians were thinking about what has become almost a by-word for such functions. But this year's Carabin weekend was no 'lark'.

In previous years we might say the social end of the exchange was important out of all proportion. And Rich Pope remarked that he had no little difficulty convincing the more gauchiste members of the Montreal campus to apply because of this.

But the skeptics were favorably impressed, largely because of the innovations this year. Usually the intellectual end of the weekend consisted of talks by guest speakers only. And this part of our program was masterfully done by Messrs. David Lewis and Peter Gzowski.

This year, however, an afternoon was set aside for the presentation of student papers which consequently won almost unqualified praise as a definite step forward. Provocative essays were given by both groups on subjects like: the economic viability of a separate Quebec; the meaning of English and French Canadianism; possible constitutional amendments; and the friction between Church and education in Quebec.

Each essay was followed by pointed debate.

Many of the Montrealers expressed surprise at the earnestness of the debates and debaters. And many found our command of French extraordinary in comparison with the unilingualism of the past 14 years. These sure signs of progress are bound to ensure our future relations with the University of Montreal.

This renewed structure of the weekend points further in the direction of successful French-English relations than was possible before. Not only sitting back passively and absorbing the words of learned speakers, now the students of both groups find themselves in a position where they must fully present and defend their points of view.

Aspern Papers well delivered

By RAVI GUPTA

The Aspern Papers, now playing at the Hart House Theatre, is a very successful play. Michael Redgrave has done a good job of adapting Henry James' story for the theatre. Although the plot is not particularly dramatic, the interest is maintained until the end with apt dialogues and good acting.

Henry Jarvis (played by Christopher Golding), a man of letters, is a great admirer of the poet Aspern about whom he wants to write a book. He suspects that an old lady, Miss Bordereau, who had been quite friendly with Aspern in her youth, has in her possession many of the poet's letters. However, she refuses to part with these documents and denies any acquaintance with Aspern.

Jarvis, believing in the old saying that "a man always gets what he wants — if he wants it badly enough," plans the acquisition of these papers with all the craft at his command.

Between these two awfully cunning persons — the man of letters and the old lady — is the latter's niece, Miss Tina. She is simple, subdued and gentle.

This is her failing, and she is deceived. They play with her emotions and use her as a pawn. In the end, however, Miss Tina takes her revenge.

Kelly Ross, playing Miss Tina, is excellent. She shows considerable promise. (I do hope she remembers her lines in the second act.) Beth Morris, a girl of 20, plays the centenarian Miss Bordereau extremely successfully. Golding starts out slightly nervously, but soon catches on. He acts well. The other actors also are quite good.

Of human inequality

By D. J. DUCKWORTH

Take a look at your friends. Save perhaps for identical twins, no two people, for all the sameness of their environments, are alike in personality, intelligence, interests, aptitudes or skills.

Some may be intelligent in the "bookish" sense: some more adept at mechanical endeavors. Some born with a natural love for music; others with a tin ear.

Anyone who has travelled beyond his native borders knows that races also differ from one another. In some cases there may be only a slight difference, due mainly to custom or tradition; in other cases the difference may be marked.

Nonetheless, Professor J. B. S. Haldane of Britain recently startled the International Congress of Genetics in Geneva when he said out loud what everyone knows. Prof. Haldane said there is no evidence that either individuals or races are equal in their natural endowment.

Anyone who dares to speak as Prof. Haldane did of inherent human inequality is bound to bring down wrath upon his head. At the very least he would be accused of denigrating democracy. Before we start accusing him of racism let's stop to consider what he means. Does recognition of the inherent inequality in our friends really pose any philosophical dilemma or destroy any democratic idea?

The trouble arises only when people confuse inequalities with some abstract idea of superiority of inferiority. It seems to be the very word—inequality that is misunderstood. It is true that we are not equal, but whether any of us is inferior to the other depends entirely on what we are talking about. It is not necessary to deny the inequalities to insist on equal rights of all of us as human beings.

In the civil rights struggle, for example, it is totally irrelevant whether the Negro people as a group have less, equal or superior natural intelligence than their white counterparts. What is relevant is that the Negro is denied equal rights as a citizen.

A man who finds it entirely natural to denounce other men cannot have much of a conception of humanity. This is the man (and I use that word with reservation) who uses supposed inequality as an excuse for discrimination. We find him making himself a segregationist, anti-semitist, anti-French crusader or what have you because, in doing so, he becomes one of a group. A remark such as: "I hate those stupid Frogs," is one that is uttered in chorus. In pronouncing it one attaches himself to a tradition and community of the mediocre.

There is a passionate pride among the mediocre and militant. Segregation is an attempt to give value to mediocrity as such—to create an elite of the ordinary.

As a device to support and extend human liberty, political democracy is a calculated risk, one worth taking but nonetheless a risk. To consider it a sound risk one must be essentially sanguine about mankind; one must believe that respect for human dignity, a desire to be free, and the quest for truth are basic instincts of all men.

Central to these fundamental issues is the role of the university as an intellectual marketplace dedicated to the maintenance of freedom in all its aspects. Here there should be no barriers to the tradition of free inquiry and unfettered dialogue. Here old prejudices are not entrenched, race is not important.

Of all things in the world reason is the most widely shared. It belongs to everyone and to no one; it is the same to all. If reason exists then the quest for truth represents the same search for all. There can be no Jewish or Christian truth, no Negro or white truth, there is only one truth and he is best who wins it.

We of this generation have an excellent opportunity to fulfil the promise of equal chance. Will we, duped by the illusion that personal good will is a substitute for collective action, go on to mouth the same old slogans and to dawdle in the same old ruts?

We face the future fortified only with the lessons we have learned in the past. It is today that we must create the world of the future for it is what we make of today that determines the fibre of tomorrow.

Prof. Haldane suggested that any satisfactory system of politics would have to be based on the recognition of "human inequality." It would be foolish to deny that all men were created with equal rights as human beings. In this respect there is no room for debate. Perhaps the world would be a better place if everyone had the same talents and abilities and were "equal" in all respects. But nothing is ever made better by denying what is true.

Library to replace ATL cards with new charge-a-plate

A new system is underway that will soon replace all use of the "Admit To Lectures" card for identification in the Sigmund Samuel library and its branches.

Future book-borrowers will flash the librarian a laminated card with their picture and embossed name, address, course, faculty, and student number on it.

The principle is much the same as the charge-a-plate, and upon presentation of the new card the librarian will merely stamp all pertinent information on to the request slip. This will eliminate the bothersome necessity of filling out a complete slip for each book, and it will give the library staff a legible record of withdrawals.

This plan has been used most successfully in many libraries in the United States. McGill University has instituted a similar system, although their cards have the disadvantage of not being embossed.

It is probable that present third- and fourth-year students will not be affected by the change this year, but processing of freshmen will begin as soon as possible, although use of the library card will be voluntary until they have been issued to the entire year. A notice will be posted in the library requesting students to come to Simcoe Hall at an appointed time to have their pictures taken and to give necessary information.

Up to 200 cards may be dispatched in three hours when the procedure is operating at full capacity. A polaroid camera photographs four students at a time, and a photo-punch clips out the exact size of picture needed. (If the student can supply a suitable photo of postage stamp size, he will not be required to have his picture taken.) It is attached to the card, which goes into an addressograph where it is "cooked" and cooled.

A machine called "Graphotype 6,400" embosses the student's name, number, course, etc. on to the card. The whole process takes approximately eight minutes.

Loss of student time is negligible, for it is only necessary to be present long enough to have the picture taken and to fill out the required information sheet. There will be a 24-hour delay before the student may pick up his card, although once the process gets past the experimental stage it is hoped that the card will be completed within 10 minutes after the student has entered the building.

It will not be necessary to completely renew the card each year, since the new date may be embossed above the old. However, if there is a change of address, the card will be replaced at no charge. There will be a fee for renewal of a lost card.

Stack privileges will remain the same, and indication of this will be embossed on the card along with the other information.

Blues dump OAVC, 5-1...

Kay followed with two fast goals 18 seconds apart to put Varsity ahead to stay before the period ended.

After a scoreless second stanza, Passi counted his second marker at 34 seconds of the third period when he scored from a scramble in front of the OAVC net. George Olah added the final goal two minutes later.

Peter Speyer continued his fine play on Blues' defence, turning in a steady game and assisting on three goals.

Redmen goalie Hank Vanderpol stopped 31 shots, many of them difficult. He turned back Passi three times from in close and robbed rookie Bobby McClelland in the final period by diving across the goal mouth to glove a hard high shot.

STRAY SHOTS: The three stars were Ward Passi, Ross Dudgeon and Peter Speyer... Dudgeon took six stitches in the forehead in the second period after hitting his head on the ice when checked heavily... Blues' all-star Stu McNeil didn't play after all as he was tied up with his medical work. McNeil has yet to play for Blues this season...

Boxla playoffs advance to semi-finals

SPS I, PHE A and Vic I advanced to the semi-finals of interfac lacrosse with quarter-final wins Thursday.

SPS I, winners of Group II, took Trinity, winners of Group III, 5-3. Wayne Archer led the skulemen with two goals while Gene Petroff, Ron Sanderson and Bruce Burgess got one each. Bill Kilfoyle counted all three Trinity markers.

PHE A were content to experiment in a 9-0 win over Vic I, winners of Group IV. PHE A now meets SPS I in the semi-final Tuesday at 1 p.m.

Two last-period goals gave Vic I, third-place finishers in Group I, a 9-7 win over UC, second-place finishers in Group II.

Dave O'Brien was a one-man wrecking crew with six tallies for Vic while Barry Loescher added two and Ron Clarke the other. Garry Kiziak led Redmen with three goals with singles coming from John Fowell, Aubrey Sugar, Les Cappe and Al Schoenborn.

Vic I advances to the semi-final against St. Mike's A Tuesday at 7:30 p.m.

U of T gymnasts place fourth at RMC in heavily-supported invitational meet

KINGSTON. — This year the intercollegiate gymnastic championship meet was wiped off the agenda because of the supposed lack of competition in Ontario and Quebec colleges. It is ironic that this should happen when enthusiasm was strong enough to send five above-average teams to the Royal Military College invitational meet here Saturday.

Varsity, RMC, Queen's, OAVC and College Militaire de St. Jean, as well as Trinity College Schools of Port Hope, Ont., were fully represented at the meet.

RMC won the meet with 105.30 points, although RMC didn't place first, second or third in any event.

Trinity was second with 103.95 points, CMS third with 93.75 and Toronto fourth with 81.25.

Art Kuismann of Queen's was the top individual with victories in the parallel bars, box horse and pommel horse, followed closely by Varsity's Digby Sale, who took the high bars and still rings.

Other placings for Toronto were Bob Smagala, second in the free calisthenics, Scott Griffiths, third in the free cal and the box horse, and Barth Curley, fourth in the parallel bars.

Old Vienna ages naturally (there is no substitute for time)

When we brew Old Vienna, we don't take shortcuts. Our brewmasters blend 5 different kinds of hops (the seedless, non-bitter kind) to arrive at Old Vienna's very much alive flavour. Then time—and only time—is lavished on Old Vienna's aging.

Again, no shortcuts. Old Vienna ages naturally, in cool, dark aging tanks to a clear, mellow smoothness.

Great brew. Try it.

Kidd edges Pete McCandle to win U.S. harrier crown

NEW YORK—University of Toronto's Bruce Kidd found himself in the unfamiliar position of having to come from behind in a race here Saturday. But the 20-year-old track ace met up to the task to edge Pete McCandle of New York and win the U.S. national cross-country championship.

At one stage of the 10,000-metre race (approximately 6 1/4 miles), Kidd trailed long-time rival McCandle by a good 100 yards. Kidd took the lead 500 yards from the finish line at Bronx's Van Cortlandt Park and won by three yards with a time of 30 minutes, 47.2 seconds. McCandle, favored to win the race, was timed unofficially in 30:47.6.

Kidd had planned to run with the leaders for the first four miles and then attempt to gradually break contact. But at the one-mile mark, Kidd was 50 yards behind McCandle and losing ground.

Kidd said after the race he lost sight of McCandle in the stampede start of 136 runners.

"I didn't think McCandle had the speed to get out in front so fast," said Kidd, "and when I realized the early rabbit was McCandle, he was already well ahead."

The high-water mark for McCandle, the defending champion, came with less than three miles remaining. At that point Kidd broke away from Bill Mills of the U.S. Marines, and Chris Williamson of University of New Brunswick and began to whittle down McCandle's margin. Kidd, Mills and Williamson had been running together second to McCandle.

For the next mile the gap diminished steadily. Then suddenly on the ascent of what is ironically called cemetery hill, Kidd surged within 15 yards of his prey. It took Kidd almost another mile and one more long hill to finally catch McCandle and the two ran together for several hundred yards.

Kidd went ahead 700 yards from the tape and then the lead exchanged hands several times before the U of T runner opened up a three-yard gap 500 yards from the finish. Kidd held this slim lead to the end.

Kidd regained the U.S. harrier championship he won two years ago at Louisville. McCandle won the title last year while Kidd was running in the British Empire Games at Perth, Australia.

The margin at the wire was identical to that separating Kidd and McCandle at the Boston Knights of Columbus two-mile race three years ago. That was the race that rocketed Kidd into international track prominence.

McCandle has placed second to Kidd many times since that Boston race but has yet to post a victory over his younger rival.

Canadians, and especially Canadian college runners, placed well in Saturday's race. Williamson finished fifth behind Mills and Ron Larrieu of Los Angeles, while Toronto Olympic club runners Dave Ellis, Dan Shaughnessy and Jim Irons placed sixth, 12th and 20th respectively.

Hylke Van der Wal of Western placed 25th.

On The Infield: McCandle, an Irish born U.S. citizen, won the 10,000 metres at the last Pan-American Games. . . The Van Cortlandt Park course wound over rough trails and wind-swept field. . . Runners were satisfied with conditions despite the cold wind that made the many spectators uncomfortable.

MORE THAN SKELETONS IN McMANUS' CLOSET

John S. McManus must really have something worthwhile stashed away in that closet of his known as Hart House gym. At least that's the impression left when you analyze McManus' reaction to the loss of three-year veteran Jerry McElroy, who announced his retirement from Varsity basketball circles last Wednesday.

"Sure, you don't like to lose a player like McElroy," commented mentor McManus. "He's played a lot of good basketball for us. But his loss isn't as serious as you might think."

JOHN McMANUS

At first thought, this reaction would seem to come as a surprise. After all, McElroy was the senior member of the Varsity team and one of Blues' top scorers in his three seasons. In his second year, 1961-62, he scored 230 points in league play to lead the college league in that department.

But this record reflects the McElroy of old and not the player who was training with Blues this season.

It is no secret that McElroy reported for training some 30 pounds over his normal playing weight and didn't show the effectiveness that marked his play the past three seasons.

McManus knew McElroy's situation better than anyone. "The shape he's in," said Cactus Jack, "he wasn't going to be that much help to us."

McElroy's lack of conditioning this season can probably be traced to his reason for quitting Blues. The 6'3" forward cites a bad left knee that he says has been giving him trouble since last season. McElroy said last week that he didn't know how he incurred the injury or exactly what it is, but he didn't believe the knee could stand up to the demanding college grind.

McElroy decided instead to play for Dow Kings of the Toronto Senior League, where little training is required and there is a lighter schedule.

THE SLOGAN SHOULD READ "PULL TOGETHER"

Nonetheless, it's unreasonable to assume that McManus is taking the loss of McElroy lightly simply because his former sharp-shooter isn't in shape. McManus must have ulterior reasons for exuding such levity.

The reasons aren't mysterious and concealed. They can easily be found by looking at Blues' current roster. No less than 10 of Blues' 14 players have intercollegiate experience and the four rookies are all top prospects.

Dave West, everybody's all-star guard last season, leads the core of Varsity veterans. West has improved in each of his seasons, if that's possible, and last year was the second-highest scorer in the league behind Tom Williamson of Western. Ed Bordas, Dave Ouchterlony, John O'Neill and Doug McKenzie round out the veteran brigade.

Behind this core, Wayne Andrew, Mike Moore, Nolan Kane and Arvo Neidre have enough college experience that they can now be expected to play a more important role with the team. And guard Bill Woloshyn, a transfer from Western, gives Blues an ace-in-the-hole. Woloshyn played three seasons with Western Mustangs before entering U of T Law School and he is a sure bet for a starting guard spot beside West.

McManus is especially pleased with his four freshmen, Vlad Baranowicz, Ron Kimel, Barry Anthony and Jim Sheldon. Baranowicz was the most celebrated player in Toronto high school basketball last season when he averaged 33 points per game for Bloor Collegiate to post the top mark in the city. The fact that he resembles West in his style of play is more than a coincidence. Both players learned their basketball at Bloor and the West End YMCA.

Anthony and Kimel have impressed with their defensive work and Kimel, at 6'5", could develop into one of the league's best rebounders. Blues have lacked a really top man under the basket since Jim Maguire's better days a few seasons back.

Even with this potentially dangerous lineup, however, observers might be quick to recall last season when Blues finished with a 5-5 record after they were expected to pose a serious challenge for the college title. Many felt that Blues failed in 1962-63, not because they lacked the talent, but because they lacked team unity. The feeling was that this disunity wasn't caused by personality conflicts or the like, but by a conflict in attitude between some of the players.

Blues are rated strong in talent again this season. But those who sensed a conflict in attitude last season might tend to feel this problem has alleviated itself this year.

Varsity basketball fans certainly hope so.

OAVC defenceman Don Kulba pushes both Blue Chris Speyer (19) and the puck into his own net during Friday's hockey game at the Arena. Austin MacKay (not shown) got credit for the goal as Blues won 5-1.

PROLONGED EXHIBITION SCHEDULE ENDS

Sloppy performance still gets win

By GORD BELLMORE

The hockey Blues finally ended their prolonged pre-season schedule Friday night at Varsity Arena with a 5-1 victory over Ontario Agricultural and Veterinary College Redmen in a dull scramble game. Blues won all five of their exhibition games this fall.

Pre-season games are designed to get a team in shape for the regular season, but Blues have been ready for two weeks and in Friday's game they played indifferently and appeared stale.

Aggies, without their top man Bob Sheffield, were a weak opponent for Blues. Redmen were only about the calibre of a good Junior "B" team, but they still made Blues look very ordinary.

The week before against McMaster, Blues were content to sit back and check Marlins after scoring four goals in the first period and they carried this self-contented attitude into Friday's game. As a result, their play was sloppy and uninspired.

There is little doubt that the long series of meaningless games was largely responsible for Blues' showing against Redmen. Blues are looking ahead to this coming weekend when they open the regular season at McGill and Queen's. One hopes that such is the case because a similar lethargic display could be costly for Blues once the shooting starts for real.

Sharpshooter Ward Passi regained his scoring eye against OAVC, firing two goals for Blues. Despite the goals, however, Passi's skating isn't yet sharp as he is still working his wounded knee back into shape. Coach Joe Kane is giving Passi extra ice time to get him into top form as quickly as possible.

Passi opened the scoring for Blues early in the first period after taking a pass from Peter Speyer, who had carried the puck from his own blue line. Aggie's Ross Dudgeon equalled the count later in the period by firing a backhand shot from close in that rookie goaltender Casey Soden only got a piece of

No finger-pointing, no accusations, no debate as audience discusses uses of Model Parliament

by IAN PORTER

There was no finger pointing, no cross-fire of accusations, no incisive elucidation of outstanding questions in Tuesday afternoon's Model Parliament campaign debate.

There was no debate.

Originally one had been scheduled in an effort to point up some compelling issue.

Instead, the four members of the audience pulled up their chairs in the Junior Common Room at University College for an informal discussion with three representatives of the Liberal, New Democratic and Communist campus parties.

No spokesman for the Conservative party appeared.

Perhaps the absence of any tumultuous thronging about the party banner prompted the obvious question: "What end," the politicians were asked, "does the Model Parliament serve?"

Alan Bowker (III UC), the NDP spokesman, offered the view that the Model Parliament elections were an opportunity to acquaint the student body with the political affairs and parties of the nation. Peter Wilson (III Trinity), presenting the Liberal stand, agreed and added that "the students of this university are politically apathetic." Wilf Szczesny, the Communist representative, said nothing.

Wilson was asked why students should engage more actively in Model Parliament politics. He replied that politics should be an issue in any intelligent community. Bowker agreed and added that not enough students thought of themselves as leaders in political affairs. Szczesny did not comment on this point.

Was there any issue that might excite some interest in the four campus platforms? "No," Bowker said, "all the platforms are good this year but there is no real issue."

He would prefer, he continued, that concentration in this election be on party personalities to arouse campus interest. Wilson disagreed on this point. The party name was what attracted voters and he did not feel that personality alone could win an election.

Apart from consideration of political technique, there was little disagreement among the three speakers.

Was there any issue that might excite some interest in the campus platforms?

"No," was Bowker's answer. All three party members were in agreement on nuclear arms.

Biculturalism was considered as well, but the success of the march on Queen's Park ruled it out as controversial.

"But think what would have happened to the march if it had been held at 3 p.m. instead of noon on the day that the president was shot," Bowker commented.

It might have attracted as little attention as the Model Parliament election this year.

Swag stolen from Varsity office last month was returned last night by Ryersonian Editor Ray Biggart. He blamed Queen's students for wrenching a large brass plate saying "The Varsity" from the wall of the SAC building. A kettle and an aggression-relieving dart-board were also returned.

Consistently poor interest marks UN Club's party leader's debate

By BOB SOROKOLIT

Student interest in campus politics is certainly consistent.

The United Nations Club's Monday night discussion period in Hart House with the four party leaders expounding on foreign affairs drew the usual crowd—eight students and one Varsity reporter.

But leaders were candid and agreeable, especially about foreign aid. They all want to give more.

Liberal leader Ivan McFarlane (IV Trin) would give at least one per cent of the gross national product to stimulate a bilateral flow of money out of Canada and qualified immigrants from these countries into Canada.

"Our policy has a foreign flavor and therefore must involve economics," he said.

Referring to The Bomb, Ivan stressed: "We would give up nuclear arms. But although peace is our only defence, complete neutralism is not valid for Canada."

NDP chief Mary Brewin (II Trinity) noted the general poor turnout across campus at debates before pointing to her platform which stresses the need for Canada to fulfil her responsibilities to the U.N.

"We must recognize the right of the People's Republic of China to a position in the U.N."

Foreign aid would never be less than $500,000,000 each year and depend on the increase of the GNP with respect to population increase.

Miss Brewin would be non-nuclear, withdraw from NATO and NORAD, all in order to "keep future wars on a conventional level."

JFK-quoting PC leader Rick Tan would remain in defence alliances "since Canada is committed to a nuclear role."

Tan, a medical student and citizen of Hong Kong, would concentrate aid to Southeast Asia, Africa, and South America.

"No country can have influence if its affluence is not distributed," he said.

As to the U.N. he said: "All nations who default in their payments should lose their U.N. vote."

The only leader to remain glued to his seat and read his typed monologue closely was Communist party boss Tim Walsh (III UC).

"We must pressure for a non-aggression pact for NATO with the Warsaw Pact. Then anyone who breaks the pact would be humiliated."

Walsh wants Canada to recognize the de facto governments of eight Communist countries representing one-eighth of the world.

Al Bowker (III UC), defeated candidate for the NDP leadership, tried to spice up the discussions by pointing barbs at Party leaders, but leaders alike agreed they were not experts and couldn't speak authoritatively on technical aspects of topics like disarmament.

As Miss Brewin walked between chairs set up for 75 people and to the coffee tables prepared for 75 people, she remarked: "Through these discussions, I think the parties are sensing their responsibility to create more interest in politics on campus."

Question charter flights

Doubts have been raised about chartered flights to Europe being offered by a graduate student at this university.

Luis Losada (SGS) has advertised two flights, one of which is a Canadian Pacific Airlines flight leaving May 31.

No proof has been found that he actually has this flight. The head office of CPA in Vancouver knows nothing of it.

CPA provides only one plane a day for such charters and the plane in question has been booked by the U of T SAC.

Losada told The Varsity that the office of CPA in New York can "back me up." But at this time that office has not replied to several telegrams.

Losada organizes his chartered flights on a co-operative basis through Holiday Travel Agencies in New York. This agency operates similar ventures at several colleges in the United States.

Last year there were some complications in Losada's project.

One plane was not filled and as a result it would have been too expensive to run.

A flight was cancelled and participants were asked if they would consent to joining a group flight on a regularly scheduled plane.

Losada said that because of the early start on the project this year, he expects to fill both planes.

Poor attendance at debate shows apathy

The four campus political parties close their Model Parliament campaigns today, after two weeks of general disinterest and apathy from students.

Signs of the apathy have included poor attendance at policy debates and misgivings by political spokesmen.

The debates, set conveniently at 1 or 4 p.m., aimed at presenting the four parties' views on topical questions. Yesterday, a debate on education was cancelled when debaters outnumbered spectators.

Party spokesmen yesterday estimated an average of 15 students attended the debates. When the four leaders debated on Canadian foreign policy Monday night, eight spectators were present.

When the parties spoke on their "main issue" yesterday — an issue they never arrived at — four students were present. The meeting degenerated into a consideration of whether Model Parliament was a good thing.

Party leaders and campaign organizers expressed fear yesterday that apathy might cut the popular vote to less than 3,000. Last year, a record 4,785 votes were cast to put the Liberals in power.

Votes not cast for the Liberal and Conservative parties — the most-often-elected governments in the past—could increase the hopes of the other parties.

"I won't say who I think will win," a Liberal party official said in The Varsity office last night.

To feature jazz band in Great Hall

Jazz will rock the great hall of Hart House this Thursday at 9 p.m.

The 13-piece band of Rob McConnell will present a jazz concert with some of Toronto's best-known musicians — Ed Bickert on guitar,
Archie Alleyne on drums,
Erich Traugott on trumpet,
Rick Wilkins on tenor sax and McConnell on valve trombone.

The band played to a sellout audience at York University last year and the campus gave them rave reviews.

Tickets are free at the Hall
Porter's desk in Hart House.
Women are welcome but must be escorted.

New College breaks from old traditions

New College is a particularly apt name for the newest addition to the University of Toronto, for it well indicates the fresh, sometimes radical attitudes which the college takes towards many of the institutions of university life.

In almost every field, new College prides itself on breaking away from the traditions of older bodies to establish new and different patterns.

Architecture is a prime example. The plans for the college's new home, to rise next year on the corner of Huron St. and Classic Ave., are vastly different from anything previously attempted on this campus.

From the street it seems to be a conventional L-shaped building, but a view from the air or from the other side shows that the inner wall is a dramatic curve, and the interior corridors tend to follow this rather than the straight outer lines.

And in the organization of its students, New College represents a departure. Maximum emphasis is placed on student-to-student exchange, and all activities are organized to promote exchange of ideas between those of different disciplines.

As yet the college is not teaching any formal courses, but has organized tutorials in mathematics, physics, chemistry and English. These have been described by New College Principal Donald G. Ivey as "general discussions of the subject — bull sessions with some direction."

In addition, the common rooms of the present college building on St. George are the scene of daily discussions and debates sparked by contact between divergent fields of knowledge.

In all things New College seeks an open-minded, rational approach to the myriad of ideas which any university student should encounter during his undergraduate days.

CUS asks for petition honoring JFK

The Canadian Union of Students is circulating a petition to all Canadian colleges and technical institutes, asking that they sign as in favor of honoring the late President John Kennedy by supporting his civil rights bill.

The petition states the bill, "part of the embodiment of his ideas, would be a most poignant and fitting memorial to this great man of our times."

The petition says, in part: "President Kennedy was ideally suited to his role as leader of the Western world. He was a young, vigorous, intellectual man with whom the common people could easily identify their hopes and aspirations. He was a firm and respected leader of the international scene, and a determined leader at home.

"No American has done more to demonstrate to the world that the conscience of the American government should be on the side of equality in opportunity and status for people of every race, creed and color."

Friday is Model Parliament election day, and if The Varsity were to follow the usual course of action it would today or Friday come out with an editorial urging students to vote for a particular party.

But this year we can see no reasons for voting ourselves, and cannot think of any reasons why we should urge students to vote for any particular party, or even vote at all.

We realize the value of political debate and do not imply that it is a waste of time. There have been many worthwhile topics at this year's all-party debates, but few persons have shown up to hear or participate.

On examining our own motives, we find that, while we cannot help but be concerned with the issues, we are not at all attracted to discussing them on a model parliamentary basis.

This leads us to believe that the student body in general is no longer interested in again going over the arguments and discussions which have been debated for years.

Without claiming to have a complete knowledge of all the issues, we are nevertheless weary of continuing the interminable discussions. We prefer to act, and we believe most students also want to do more than talk.

More than two weeks ago a few students decided more than talk was needed on the Confederation crisis. They acted, and almost 3,000 chose to act with them in a march on Queen's Park.

Few would dispute that our social and political conditions leave much room for improvement. But we are tired of hearing people talk about the deplorable social conditions in Latin America; we are tired of overlasting debate on capital punishment; mere reports on Toronto slum conditions are now redundant. In short, we have heard most of the arguments and now we want to do something.

And furthermore, we are able to do something, although there are as yet few facilities for accommodating such action. But the organizations which do not now exist can be created. Within this university we have the manpower to carry out constructive action; and within our society we have the wealth to finance such action.

Instead of deploring illiteracy in Latin America, we can raise money and send people to teach; instead of sending sympathetic telegrams to South African student groups, we can organize on a basis of positive action which will help eliminate the conditions we dislike; instead of discussing and reading about local slum conditions, we can organize and send interested students to work in these areas.

These suggestions are not original or unique. Within the last few years several universities in the United States and the University of Montreal have started similar programs. Generally, they have found their biggest problem to be one of finding enough activities to keep interested students occupied.

Last night an ad hoc group of students met to discuss these ideas. They did not represent a single point of view, but they did indicate a widespread desire to act on some of our undesirable social conditions.

These people realize that it is not enough to discuss, understand and sympathize with persons who live under less fortunate circumstances. They know that a financial donation to a cause, while admirable, is not enough.

They have decided to act, not in the manner of the isolated interest group, but with the object of providing concerned students with a means of positive action.

So, Friday we will not bother to vote in the Model Parliament elections. Again we realize the value of debate, but that value pales when compared to the opportunity to act which we now have.

Lethargy in the office (a political affliction?) as the pollsters took over. But only after much hypochondria from Donna Mason, senior reporter. Help from Susan Stump and Helene Hersberg on the keys. Asistitally, Don Smith and Yvke Richter. With the illness, Bruce Lewis, Bob Sorokoll, Ian Piller and Cathy Flavell (who tried). War (Who Knows Rien) and photo-fueled ate corned beef, the rest, milk. And the Ryersonian staff stopped in, gratefully. Sports as Baltimore and Kedd and Sheila. Photo-fueled Gollo and the Czar, as usual and John Boly (pronounced Boly) made a splash on his first appearance. Barker of the EE mourned (Project X fuz zle again).

Following are five questions that have been posed to the leaders of the campus parties running for Model Parliament. The party leaders for the 1964 Model Parliament are Liberal, Ivan McFarlane; Conservative, Richard Tan; New Democrat, Mary Brewin and Communist, Tim Walsh.

(1) CONFEDERATION

(2) DEFENCE

(3) EDUCATION

(4) WELFARE

(5) GENERAL

COMMUNIST

Yes, our party believes that French and English Canada are distinct nations. They each have their own culture, their own language, their own territory and their own psychological make-up.

Our party would call an election of a committee to set up a new confederal pact. This committee would have equal representation from English and French Canada, and the pact would ensure economic and cultural equality of the two nations, and would contain explicit guarantees of the right of each nation to secede from the pact if the majority of that nation voted to do so.

Our party believes that Canada's defence policy is based on the entirely false premise that it is possible to defend Canada in a nuclear war.

We would get rid of our nuclear arms immediately. We would get out of NATO and NORAD and put our NATO troops at the disposal of the United Nations. We think that these changes would help to ease tensions, thus making Canada far more secure than the biggest bomb could possibly do.

Our party would have the Government provide enough money that education could be entirely free of cost to the student right from elementary school through university. With half the money now spent on arms this would be possible. We would not insist that all students attend public schools but would not finance private schools.

The federal government has the responsibility to plan its economy in such a way that every person able to work has a job, and our party would eliminate unemployed people with an income equal to about three quarters of what they were earning or would be earning if they had work. People over 65 who wished to retire would get three quarters of their previous wage for old age pensions. A wide set-up of nurseries, both day-care and overnight, would be set up for children of mothers who wished to work.

We would plan our economy to meet the needs of society, gearing production so as to employ all those able to work. Workers would be encouraged to use their initiative in inventing ways to make production more efficient. As factories became automated, hours would be cut instead of workers being laid off. More schools and universities would be built, so that all those who could benefit from an education could get one. We think that building more schools is a better answer to the problem of overcrowding than raising the fees and raising entrance requirements.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Pine needles are up

Re. your article on Chinese poetry in the VARSITY Weekend Review, Nov. 29, 1963.

How easy it is to talk of Chinese culture (or of any foreign one), but how difficult it is to understand it, or even to be able to see a Chinese painting right side up! The painting of Huangshan, on the first page of the Review, is printed upside-down. You certainly can not be blamed for not being able to recognise the Chinese handwriting; but at least you should know that the leaves of pine trees point upward—even in China!

Ignorant of equality

I am shocked by the ignorance shown by D. J. Duckworth in his article "Of Human Inequality." May I ask him what are the facts that make it so perfectly obvious to him that races are not equal in their natural endowment? Furthermore, what makes the author so sure that he is not committing a complete historical and biological inaccuracy when he speaks of race? Since we biologically stem from a common stock, we must conclude that all succeeding variations have been caused by environmental factors. Even then, the historical study of any so-called "race" will show that this group of people has so frequently married with other groups that characteristics from all races may be found in any one.

Since inequality implies quite strongly the "superior-inferior" relation, let us look at some of these obvious inequalities. Most biologists would agree that the mental capabilities of all groups of people are completely dependent on their social environment. The "purest" example of an "Anglo-Saxon" who has been brought up in the Ozark Mountains would have great difficulties in entering this university; yet I, a Jew, have made it. Yet, if our cultural positions had been reversed, I would still be in the Ozarks.

Nor do I mean to say that the Ozark environment is in any way inferior. The nature of any culture serves its own purpose. As for physical inequalities, I will be glad if you can show me any.

I am sure that Mr. Duckworth, in a perfectly liberal frame of mind, meant to say that peoples are different. However, it is just such gross inaccuracies, not so much by Mr. Duckworth, but rather by Prof. Haldane, which allow racists to scream that a certain people is inferior and give credence to their ranting by quoting somebody important.

Mitchell Bornstein

ation" to the French-speaking Canadiens implies concept of a cultural background, while "nation" to English-speaking Canadian means a political entity. is why we use the phrase "Canada is ONE COUN- with TWO CULTURES" in order to avoid the dif- ty of semantics.

is is one example of the main problem—a lack of understanding and appreciation of each others' lan- guage background and feelings on the part of both the ch-speaking and English-speaking Canadiens-Can- ns.

Canada at present enjoys the security of collective nce (NORAD and NATO), and must therefore play ull role in these organizations. At present, this ns accepting and retaining nuclear weapons, and believe that Canada must fulfill this responsibility. e long-range policy must be one of disarmament. ang should reconstruct her defence on the basis of ng up a mobile and self-contained conventional e as a step toward disarmament.

ducation, we believe, is a provincial affair and must onsidered with respect to Ontario. (1) We recom- d that a more comprehensive system of scholar- s, bursaries and loans, based on need, be set up. ial emphasis should be put on graduate fellowships ect the increasing need for university professors in riorio. (3) Further aid should be granted to universi- (4) The National Housing Act should be amended hat non-profit student residences (like the Univer- of Toronto Student Co-operative Residence and gnized fraternities and sororities) be subsidized.

) We are in favour of a comprehensive, pre-paid th insurance program integrating all existing plans government agencies such as PSI and Ontario Hos- Insurance for Ontario. (2) We believe in a pension me with nation-wide portability and universal cov- e. (3) We believe that the government should pro- adequate facilities, human and material resources, rmation regarding job opportunities and trade open- , and labour mobility to provide industries with an er structure".

e believe that the key to the whole problem is edu- on. By producing skilled people we can harness echnology and utilize automation and not be displac- y them.

n the international scene, we believe that Canada t play her full share in the United Nations and with allies. Canada should set aside one per cent of her s national product for foreign aid.

n the economic scene, we believe that Canada must ually regain control of her economic destiny. Canada's future lies with the educated and intellec- elite.

The Liberal Party believes that Canada is one nation composed of two distinct and equal cultural entities.

Our aim is to restore French Canada to a position of cultural and economic equality. We shall take positive measures to ensure that French Canadians will be able to work, think, and create in the French language in all areas of Canada with an appreciable French-speaking population. We shall introduce a new flexibility into Confederation to enable Quebec to fulfil its constitutional obligations in the fields of education, social welfare and local development. We shall encourage biculturalism so that all Canadians will have an opportunity to share in the riches of a dual culture.

Our party reaffirms its support of Canada's continued firm allegiance to the western alliance. But we do not feel that Canada is playing a proper role in the various alliances (eg NATO, NORAD) at this time, in view of her acceptance of nuclear arms.

Specifically we urge: 1) Canada's adoption of a non-nuclear role; 2) the creation of a permanent UN police force to which Canada could offer training ground and technical assistance; 3) Canada's continued membership in NATO, NORAD and the UN; 4) active support of the limited test ban treaty with a view to developing wider areas of agreement in the field of international peace and co-operation, especially through the facilities of the UN.

We propose: 1) Institution of a large programme for study abroad by grants to graduates. 2) Enable post graduates to pursue their studies by subsidizing research in Canada. 3) Grants to universities to expand libraries and research facilities. 4) Grants to the provinces for the establishment of vocational schools and polytechnical institutions. We will institute a programme of scholarships for bilingual students. 6) We will give financial assistance to French-speaking students wishing to study at English-speaking universities (or vice versa).

Present joint welfare programmes should continue only as long as they are acceptable to the parties concerned, and all provinces will be allowed to opt out of any future plans. Specifically we propose: 1) A programme of medical care to be administered by the provinces. This plan must make medical care available for everyone, include the provision of free prescription drugs, be on a fee-for-service basis and have the approval of the local medical association. 2) A national contributory pension plan to be financed by individual contributions.

Advanced technology and automation have accompanied our expanding economy: they will lead to greater specialization. We envisage some temporary dislocation, and in the short run we propose: For workers: institute retraining programmes. For industry: An intensive study to determine which of our industries are efficient. Then specialization and large scale production. In the long run all our resources will be at optimal use. Government plans and agencies will offset any effects of a depression.

Our party believes that Canada is founded upon the equality of two nations, partners in Confederation.

We would abolish conditional grants and readjust tax-sharing to compensate. We recommend that the central government continue the system of equalization grants and that Dominion-Provincial conferences should be held regularly with a permanent secretariat. We would encourage bilingualism in the public service and the teaching of French at the primary school level. We would further suggest that a Bill of Rights be integrated in the British North America Act which would define the collective rights of the French minorities.

We think that Canada's present defence policy is outdated. It indicates the fact that our government has not recognized the necessity of re-examining its policies in the light of modern scientific advancements.

We would reject nuclear weapons for Canada. We would recall our forces in Europe. Our military contribution of the past must be replaced by a light mobile conventional force for use anywhere in the world, hopefully under the direction of the United Nations.

The cancellation of anti-bomber programs makes NORAD superfluous. Our withdrawal from Europe is a uni-lateral alteration of the NATO military agreements. We will, however, remain signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty until 1969 as it is part of the treaty.

We believe that to meet the critical problems in education the federal government must make special grants to the Provinces. These grants should be graded to equalize educational opportunities to the level of the most advanced provinces. In order to provide all students of equal ability with an opportunity for higher education we would provide funds for free tuition. There must be recognition of the growing need for technical institutes and specialized colleges to meet the crisis produced by technological advances.

The industrial and technological revolutions have made men more dependent on each other than ever before. We must make the welfare state provide security to allow individual development and opportunity, not conformity.

The New Democrats would introduce a comprehensive national health plan, a portable contributory pension plan, to pay 50 per cent of previous earnings, extensive penal reform, to separate classes of criminals and rehabilitate them, and abolition of capital and corporal punishment.

Workers fear permanent unemployment, industries fear foreign competition, and individuals are afraid that development may make their product obsolete. The New Democrats would set up an Economic Planning Council to deal with economic dislocations. The Department of Trade and Commerce would immediately initiate studies of and negotiations for, the reduction and removal of all tariff barriers. The federal government in conjunction with the provincial governments and private industry, will establish a massive retraining program.

Freedom at SMC

On behalf of the philosophy students of St. Michael's College may I thank you for your concern about our academic freedom. However, there is a point about which I would like to be enlightened — just what are these ideas and books that are unavailable to us in our ivory-towered cloisters. You see, I took a look through our philosophy library and as far as I could see there are all the works of every major Western philosopher (plus texts on other systems of philosophy).

Of course, since we are "prevented from reading certain books" it may be that there are some philosophers I haven't heard of. Perhaps in your valiant quest for truth and academic freedom you might publish a list for us—of course you run the risk of being put on the Index. By the way, did you know that any book necessary for a course—whether on or off the Index — is available to St. Michael's students — remarkable how liberal even Catholics become.

One last point — one of my philosophy professors maintains there isn't such a thing as Catholic philosophy — it's like having Catholic mathematics! Shame, let him be Anathema!

Favored Irish and PHE square off in boxla final

By AL SCHOENBORN

As expected, PHE A and St. Mike's A advanced to the lacrosse finals for the Dafoe Trophy on semi-final victories yesterday.

PHE A built up an early lead over SPS I and coasted to a 9-5 win over the Group II winners.

Don Arthurs was his usual conspicuous self, scoring seven times on the bewildered SPS goalie. Bill Watters and Jim McElroy rounded out the Phys Ed scoring.

Wayne Archer paced Skule with a pair of goals, while Paul Bishop, Bruce Burgess and Gene Petroff added the others.

St. Mike's A showed a diversity of attack even without Don Schmidt, as six players hit the scoresheet in a 9-3 win over Vic I.

Vern McCreary, Jim Smith, and Barry Fleming all potted a pair while singletons went to George Olah, Jack Riordan and Tony Fiorini. Dave O'Brien scored all three Vic markers in a losing cause.

The first game of the best-of-three final will be played Thursday at 1 p.m. with the other games slated for next Tuesday and Thursday (if necessary) at the same time.

HOCKEY

Vic I moved to its third successive victory in Group I play, Friday, as Niels Ortvad scored with less than two minutes left in the game to break a scoreless deadlock and give Vic a 1-0 triumph over St. Mike's A.

A 5-2 win over Meds A moved Trinity A in front of a tight race in Group II.

Mark Bowden, Paul Bates, Jim Edwards, Modris Eksteins and Mike Proctor shared the Trinity scoring, while George Magee and Bob Cote replied for Meds.

Larry Adey, Len Good, Dave Payne and Dave Murray all counted in UC II's 4-2 win over Jr. SPS. Skule tallies came from Dave Church and Rob Ball.

Group IV play saw Law A move into first place with a close 3-2 victory over Knox College.

Recent Intermediate scores:

SPS XI 5, St.M. F 0; SPS II 7, UC III 2; Dent C 2, Vic VIII 0; Pharm B 7, Arch 2; SPS XI 5, Vic X 1; SPS V 6, SPS III 0; New 11, For B 2; SPS X 10, UC III 2; Meds C 3, SPS VIII 2; Vic IV 4, St. M. D 3; St.M. C 5, SPS II 4; SPS X 1, Vic IX 0; UC IV 4, SPS IX 1.

BASKETBALL

A lone basketball encounter saw PHE I edge Sr. SPS 23-19. Wayne Wessell led the winners with seven points while Bob Eddy hooped a like number for Skule.

SENIOR INTERCOLLEGIATE HOCKEY PREVIEW

McGill, Laval, Mac rated best behind Blues

By GORD BELLMORE

The 1963-64 hockey season officially gets underway for Varsity Blues when they travel to McGill and Queen's for games Friday and Saturday.

The Senior Intercollegiate League is comprised of seven teams in one group this year. Formerly, the league was divided into an eastern and western division. The teams play a 12-game schedule each. Judging from past performances and exhibition games, McGill, McMaster, and Laval, should give the favored Blues the best run for the league championship. Perennial cellar dwellers University of Montreal and Waterloo do not appear to have added enough to improve their lots, while Queens, never a hockey power before, should be able to climb a few rungs higher on the ladder than these two.

Here then is a quick run-down on Blues' competition, in the order they should finish, as this corner sees it:

McMASTER MARLINS

Last year's Queen's Cup championship club lost in a few places from last year and has added in about as many others. Top newcomers are Jim McKendry (defence) and Bob Apps (wing). Top hold-overs are Jim McLellan and Gary Spoor, among others. Marlins chief strong points are Jim Cannon in goal and their overall team depth.

Outlook: About as good as last year.

McGILL REDMEN

Optimism reigns at McGill, as usual, but despite some top flight newcomers, Redmen lost too much talent from last year, including Larry Jones, to rate with Blues or Marlins. "If" Bernard Roy, ex-Laval all-star defenceman, and "if" Ken Walters, former pro goalie, join the team, McGill will be tough. As it is now, Redmen are still looking for scorers, which they lacked last year.

Outlook: The darkhorse, but likely will battle Laval for third.

LAVAL ROUGE ET OR

Last year's Eastern Division winners, Rouge et Or lost two all-stars in Bernard Roy and Ray Cadieux, both of whom will be tough to replace. Only eight men are back from last year, but among these are tough defencemen Gerard Guy, and the magician Mo Grenier in goal. Their strength — they're tough at home.

Outlook: Rebuilding, but could finish as high as third.

QUEEN'S GOLDEN GAELS

Unfortunately for Queen's, only football players flock to Kingston. In all their games last year Gaels were only 3-13-3, and they haven't added anyone of note this season. With Montreal and Waterloo, they will definitely form the "second division" of the league, barring a miracle.

Outlook: Gloomy. Gaels will be hard put to stay ahead of U. of M. and Waterloo.

MONTREAL CARABINS

Unlike the other French-Canadian school, Laval, U. of M. doesn't have good hockey players. Claude Chapleau, Andre Boucher and Jean Cusson rate, but there is not much after them.

Outlook: A genuine lack of talent will leave them at or near the bottom.

WATERLOO WARRIORS

This school is just too small for the senior league since breaking up with Waterloo Lutheran. Lutheran is a better team than Warriors, and Lutheran was soundly thrashed by Blues and McMaster. Lack of talent, again, is the problem. Warriors may be able to extend U. of M. or Queen's, but they won't come close to the others.

Outlook: Overmatched.

Oh yes. . . Blues should win it all.

Squash team makes rare trip to New England

An extended road trip is a rarity for Varsity's intercollegiate squash team. This is one of the exceptional years, however, as U of T squashers take off today for a four-meet trip through New England.

The Varsity team will visit Wesleyan University of Middletown, Conn., Trinity College of Hartford, Amherst College of Amherst, Mass., and Williams College of Williamstown, Mass. before returning home Sunday.

The competition will be formidable as Amherst was ranked ninth in the U.S. last season and Williams sixth.

Blues are taking their full team of nine players on the exhibition jaunt. Listed in order of ranking, they are: Leighton McCarthy, Doug Tilley, Paul Wilson, Frank Buck,

LEIGHTON MCCARTHY

Don Matthews, Paul Bugl, Wally Ross, Jim Rowland and Mike Gardiner.

McCarthy, Tilley and Buck were members of last year's intercollegiate team while the rest are newcomers. Most notable among the "rookies" is Paul Wilson, also known as "The Golden Toe" of Rugger Blues. Wilson has been impressive with the squash team this season and should crack the lineup for the intercollegiate championship at Western next February.

Gone from last year's team are Morley Smith and Bruce Robb.

McCarthy is Blues' top man, ranked first. He recently won the Ontario "C" tournament and will be one of the favorites for the singles title at the OCAA meet.

Blues finished second to McGill and ahead of Western in last year's title meet. This season should provide a closer tournament with McGill having lost three of its five first-team players through academic ineligibility. McGill won all 10 of its matches in last year's meet with Toronto winning its five over Western.

McGill, however, still has Ross Adair, the defending singles champion

FIRST LOSS OF THE SEASON

Cagers find Syracuse too hot to handle

By PAUL HENDERSON

Varsity Basketball Blues lost their first game of the season Monday at Syracuse.

The Cagers were out-classed, 88-33, by a strong Syracuse University squad in an exhibition contest.

The game was a contest until the 10-minute mark, as Blues played good ball to resist the potent Syracuse attack and match their opponents on the scoresheet with 10 points.

Then the barrage started.

Dave West fouled out of the game after 12 minutes to open the way for two drives sparked by Peter Schoff and high school all-American Dave Bing. The former drive netted seven points for Syracuse and then Bing produced 10 consecutive points. Syracuse held a 33-17 half-time lead.

The Toronto attack was rendered powerless by some pathetic and hard-luck shooting. Blues hit for only 12 field-goals in 70 attempts.

Ed Bordas led the important Varsity offence with 10 points and 16 rebounds and took top game-honors in the latter category.

Bordas' rebound statistic is particularly notable, for Syracuse's Dick Trobridge and Chuck Richards were both 6'8" tall.

In the second half, Syracuse coach Fred Lewis took advantage of his team's depth to substitute regularly and wear down Blues.

Employing a full-court press, Syracuse stole the ball consistently from the obviously tired Toronto team. As a result, Blues failed to count from the floor during the final 13 minutes of play.

Under the Basket: Coach John McManus had praise for the accomplished Syracuse team. . . Dave Bing, 6'3", the star of the game, could out-jump his 6'8" teammates. . . Bill Woloshyn of Blues suffered a twisted ankle in the first half but returned for spot duty. . . In the first OCAA game of the season, defending Wilson Cup and Canadian champions Windsor University Lancers got off to a good start. They bombed McMaster 102-72 in the Border City Saturday to extend last year's unbeaten record.

Syracuse: Bing (16), Richards (12), Seaman (11), Schoff (8), Duffy (8), Nicolletti (8), Boehm (7), Goldsmith (6), Murray (2), Trobridge (2), Ableman (1), Penceal (1), Vernick (6).

Toronto: Bordas (10), Woloshyn (7), Ouchterlony (4), West (4), Kane (4), Moore (2), O'Neill (2), Andrew, Anthony, and Sheldon.

rinks competing in the UWO invitational bonspiel. The first rink, Tom Cushing, Jim Creighton, Wayne Shepherd and Jim Upper, won the second event in a playoff.

U of T's second rink, Bob Reid, Blair Binkley, Doug Munro and Ray Lilly, lost out in the finals of the third event.

This season's intercollegiate curling championship will be held at OAUC, Feb. 14 and 15.

New campus for York U will differ from U of T: Student will be yardstick for everything

By JIM MacKENZIE
Varsity News Editor

The principles and design underlying the new York University campus will be a contrast to the University of Toronto in one basic respect: the student will be the yardstick for everything.

York Librarian T. F. O'Connell indicated that concern for students would be expressed in areas apart from architecture and landscaping alone.

Significantly, the first building to be ready for the 1965 opening will be an interim library. The permanent library, a high-rise structure at the centre of the campus, will face as many problems as the U of T library and more, Mr. O'Connell explained in an interview.

As well as collecting current publications, Mr. O'Connell has to face the problem of obtaining a simulation of the collection of printed knowledge a university such as Toronto has amassed in the past century.

"If I had all the money in the world, I couldn't get the books we will need and want," he said Wednesday.

He hopes to have a basic collection of 50,000 books for undergraduate use soon after the library opens. By 1969, the accessions should have expanded to about 400,000. This is when the problem grows: when graduate students will require a concentration of specialized books.

And these money can't buy. Old and precious volumes are either prohibitively costly or out of print. There is only one place where York and other of Ontario's new colleges can turn: to other and older libraries. For York, U of T won't be the final answer.

Mr. O'Connell was a librarian at Harvard for 12 years. He realizes that collections of individual libraries can't continue to grow, competing with one another. "Harvard has 7,000,000 books. Library of Congress has 10,000,000. Yet Harvard has had to go to Boston University for a book. Libraries will have to learn to share their wealth."

This is his hope. York's library—perhaps the first of many—will possibly have duplicates on photostat or microfilm of U of T's rare book collection. Or both York and Varsity will be members of an international inter-library loan setup—perhaps.

"Perhaps" because Mr. O'Connell is not sure. He does feel, however, that York may have specialization in some field and will consequently have a leading collection in that field. Her library would be open to other institutions.

He is not sure of the future of communications. Books as we know them may be passé within a decade. This is why York will have a complex television circuit reaching every major building where classes or students meet.

But he is immediately sure of something. His first students will have access to as wide and duplicated a collection of basic works as he can get his hands on. "I'll do everything I can to strengthen the collection, within the limits of copyright," he says forcefully.

And this is the lesson little York—a sleeping scholastic giant—can teach this university. Good books and plenty of copies of most have to be had, at great cost or by unconventional and technological methods.

Plans for new $150,000,000 York campus were unveiled Wednesday. First of 12 colleges each of 1,000 students will be open by 1965. Enrolment by 1980 will equal present U of T figure. Campus will have "literally a million" trees, and natural lakes. Architecture will blend with divisions of knowledge, with area of science buildings joining arts in the humanities and social science building and library at centre of campus.

Colleges will radiate from centre and will be units of structure. Colleges will house students from all faculties, like New College. Professional schools and sports facilities will ring campus. No cars will be allowed on main campus.

High-rise buildings will relieve horizontal concentrations to give sense of silhouette and destination. Space is basic principle, with courts, water and trees permeating campus. Open central area, free of cars, will be "where minds and people meet in atmosphere of freedom." The architect's theme: "the student—a human being—will be the yardstick."

AMPP urges destruction of ballots

At Wednesday's final Model Parliamentary policy debate, the four party leaders agreed student apathy was the noticeable feature of this year's campaign.

But they claimed the apathy was only the natural result of their long and unsuccessful series of debates.

The meeting, originally scheduled for Convocation Hall, was transferred to the Hart House South Sitting Room. Eighteen spectators were present.

One student jumped up during the discussion on apathy, and asked about a new campus party, the Abolish Model Parliament party.

Liberal leader Ivan McFarlane (III Trin) said he had heard of the party, organized Wednesday at Trinity. He said that rather than not vote, the "party" members decided to protest.

"It's unfortunate that protest should have this sort of manifestation," he said.

NDP Leader Mary Brewin (II Trin) admitted frankly she had "some sympathy for this party," and that "Model Parliament is not all it could be."

She added that concerned students "should join a party and work through that."

The AMPP has since gained unofficial support from many Trinity and Engineering students.

AMPP spokesman Dave Beatty (III Trin), SAC publications commissioner, said his party regarded Progressive Free-Soilers as "a bunch of lunatics." The Soilers had earlier asked students to spoil their ballot today by smearing it with soil.

Beatty outlined the AMPP platform as for abolition of Model Parliament, for federal grants to "Flat Earth Society," for the elimination of Rutland (England's smallest county), and destruction of ballots today by marking in an "X" and an "AMPP."

Claim RCMP check in Regina

The Student Representative Council of the University of Saskatchewan has warned its students that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has approached students, asking them to co-operate in investigations on campus.

The council acknowledged the report of an unnamed student who claimed he had a three-hour discussion in a restaurant with a man who asked him to act as a contact in security investigations.

The student said he was given only a telephone number, "in case there was anything (he) would like to talk about."

He said he did not co-operate in any way, and that the man told him the RCMP could not even get a student directory, co-operation was so bad.

Principal W. A. Riddell said later the student involved took a "correct" attitude in refusing to co-operate.

At the SRC meeting, Commerce representative Barry Wroe said he felt the alleged RCMP approach was justified. "This is the only way a government can check into its security—investigators can't walk around wearing badges advertising their jobs."

In Ottawa, an RCMP spokesman declined to comment on the SRC resolution.

Brute Force wins over water bombs

An audience composed of Engineers, firecrackers and water bombs Thursday decided that the Brute Force Committee should not be abolished.

Speaking for the ayes, Gary Kelly (III Vic) decried the "ludicrous spectacle of several little people chained to a popgun."

"It's obviously a phallic symbol," he said. "And what's worse, they've even got one guy carrying the thing—as if he didn't have one of his own."

At this point a water bomb reminded him that there were girls in the audience.

Brute Force Committee Chief John Kerr (II APSC) claimed the BFC was actually a humanitarian institution, since "it makes the world a better place for Engineers."

He added that it came in handy at initiations, making them much more fun for second, third and fourth-year students.

"And from a more practical point of view," he said, "we initiated the SHAPE auction, which was later copied by Vic and Trinity."

Jim Huzel (III Vic) never got a chance to deliver his remarks. The Skule-Vic water gun fight had moved into the hall outside the debating room, and audience and debaters alike deserted rhetoric for a more physical form of argument.

Skule was an easy winner in the water-fight, because of their choice of weapons. Enormous water-guns and quart detergent bottles went into action against more conventional, smaller water guns used by the Vic duelists.

The battle raged throughout the Mechanical Building and finally terminated in the Engineering Stores about an hour later.

Issue challenge for progress

By LYN OWEN

A personal challenge to the university student, undergraduate and graduate, is presented in the University College "Current Lecture Series," to begin next term.

So much has been said, and blamed upon, the impersonality of the formal university education of today that many students are inclined to sit back and blame inadequacy and failure upon the system provided for them.

During his university years particularly, many questions face the undergraduate on many different facets of life. His relationships with society and himself come under close survey.

He is faced with the fact that he must either participate in life to its fullest or sit back and determine his future through default.

The Current Lecture Series is a personal program concerning the development of the student in university life.

All the talks and seminars will relate to the central theme of "Progress Reconsidered"—an attempt to re-examine the notion of progress and the fact that man's nature is such that the advances in technology brought about by progress create artificial barriers to his own progress.

Various significant aspects of man in the modern age will be the topics of lectures and seminars by experts in their fields.

Canadian and American university teachers will speak on progress and its relation to religion, modern morality, human personality technology and politics.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Skulemen 'open' library

University of Toronto Engineers Wednesday officially opened the new library of University College.

Moving the official construction sign and a Johnny-on-the-Spot to the centre of the front campus, between 20 and 30 engineers conducted opening ceremonies for the "new wing".

Rae Simpson (III APSC) gave the opening address, and the engineers returned the sign and portable toilet to their previous locations, after providing the "new wing" with "some interesting reading matter—or possibly a substitute for toilet paper"—several old Varsitys.

Entry forms can be obtained at the SAC office.

Tree grows in Hart House

Christmas Tree Night at Hart House will usher in the Christmas season with music Dec. 12.

The carillon will be played between 8 and 8:30 p.m. to introduce the night's program, the theme of which is international.

Christmas music will be presented by a campus Indian group and a steel band under the direction of Nick Inmiss. Adam Mitchell will sing Scottish and French traditional music.

The Hart House Glee Club will give a selection of Christmas carols, and the audience will take part later in the singing.

Free tickets will be distributed this week in the SAC office Thursday at 12:30 and Friday at 1:30. Bring a blanket.

NDPs win surprise victory

WATERLOO (Special). — Waterloo University College elected a New Democrat government Wednesday, for the first time in the history of their Model Parliament.

The New Democrats polled 336 votes, 40 more than the second-place Liberals. The Conservatives trailed badly with 139 votes, while the Socreds got 60.

The Model Parliament, which sits in mid-January, will have a New Democrat government with 26 seats, while the Liberal opposition will have 23. As at U of T, the government cannot fall, but its bills will be at the mercy of the Tories' 12 and Socreds five seats.

The new prime minister is Gerry Pout - MacDonald, a fourth-year student in political science. This is the second year in which he has led the New Democrats in the Model Parliament campaign.

Unofficial reports indicated university administration was angry at the victory, fearing reprisals from wealthy patrons of the traditionally Conservative college.

Communist line dropped

The Varsity wishes to apologize to the Communist party for a typographical error in The Varsity Wednesday.

A line was inadvertently dropped from the section on welfare. The Communist views should have read:

"Our party will eliminate unemployment as soon as possible, in the meantime we will provide unemployed people with an income of about three-quarters of what they were earning, or would be earning, if they had work."

St. Mike's Choir to sing Sunday

Christmas in music will be celebrated this Sunday in Hart House by the St. Michael's Cathedral Choristers.

The most ancient and classic sacred music begins the Christmas theme and lasts through half of the program.

The traditional Silent Night will lead off to a selection of 15th-century Spanish motets.

The Gregorian chant Ecce Nomen Domini will be followed by a polyphonic piece based on its theme, both sung by the entire choir.

One of the boys, a soprano soloist, will then sing Mozart's Alleluia.

The performance will finish off with the entire choir singing a medley of Christmas carols in their modern settings.

The concert begins at 9 p.m. Sunday in the Great Hall of Hart House.

Tickets can be obtained free at the Hall Porter's desk.

New Year's Ball to be in HH

Hart House this year will once again be the site of the traditional New Year's eve ball.

For $12 per couple, Hart House offers dancing to the music of Stanley St. John and his orchestra, free coffee, milk and soft drinks in the Coffee Shop, folk singers Mary-Jane and Winston in the Music Room, films in the Debates room and sitting in the Map Room.

The gala midnight Saturnalia will be followed by supper in the Great Hall and two splash parties in the pool. Dancing will end at 3 a.m., at which time the Map Room will also be cleared.

A limited supply of tickets are available in the Undergraduate office at Hart House.

why?

We often hear the phrase: What is this world coming to? — uttered when a person witnesses or hears of something tragic or discouraging.

The question of what is also to be heard in several other contexts: What should we do about this or that situation? What course of action should we take under these circumstances? What will we do if . . . ?

A circumstance involving a question including the word what implies that the why part of the situation has been answered. If we are asking what we should do, it implies that we have decided to do something and are in the process of determining what course of action should be taken. When we ask ourselves what kind of a car we will buy, it means we have already decided that for some reason we will buy a car.

The what type question is the kind which is debated by our politicians, among others. What will we do about unemployment? What will we do about taxation? What defence measures will we take?

These questions imply that we must have decided to do something about unemployment; we have a reason for taxation; and we have decided that we need to defend ourselves.

Until we have made these decisions, we cannot be expected to give intelligent answers to the what questions. The question of what kind of a car we will buy has no meaning until we have decided to buy a car, or are at least considering the purchase of a car.

Naturally, the why questions will revert to other what questions. Why we will choose to buy a car will revert to the question of what we will use for transportation, and so on. Eventually all these questions will find their origin in the individual's basic philosophy. This philosophy will be the individual's guiding principle and will determine the general direction his life takes.

To make meaningful decisions as individuals — or as a state or a society — it is necessary that we have this guiding principle. Otherwise we will find ourselves making decisions on an ad hoc basis. We will be influenced by the circumstances of time and place; and since we have no predetermined starting point, we cannot have a desired end.

Without a starting point and an end we can of course have no sense of direction.

The situation described approximates that of our society and the individuals of which it is constituted.

As a social unit, who are we, what are we and, more important, why are we? Because a social unit at least is a total of its individuals, these same questions must first be applied to the individuals within our society, and until we can individually answer why we are, we cannot answer any of the other questions.

This is not to say that every individual must know why man, as an abstraction or a totality, exists. But it does mean that every individual which makes up the totality must have an answer to his own existence in the context of his life span and in view of the fact of his existence. What this answer is does not matter so much as the consideration of the question and the formulation of an answer.

Until the individual can answer, at least to himself, why he should not commit suicide he will have no basis upon which he can make his decisions. He will not be able to determine why he makes a decision, but he will continually be forced to decide what decision to make.

Until the individuals within a society have determined a philosophy, the society itself will have no philosophy, and therefore no sense of direction.

Without a sense of direction the society, like its individual members, will be deterred, redirected and reversed upon its own decisions by the circumstances it encounters.

If society is to progress the basis of that progression is in the individuals within society. In other words, it is within every one of us.

Another Model Parliament with no new ideas

By BRUCE LEWIS

Among the few defects of the campus Model Parliament is a tendency to include or emphasize issues or proposals which do not relate to the most urgent problems facing the country.

For instance, this year the Conservatives devoted almost one-fifth of their platform to immigration; the Liberals a similar space to free trade.

There's nothing wrong with this as such; it's undoubtedly a good idea for the campus groups to do some deep thinking and research and perhaps propose some new and startling solutions. But this seldom happens. For example, the two issues mentioned above show little that's profound and nothing that's new. Free trade and its American aspect "reciprocity" were decisively rejected by all political parties in 1911.

The Conservatives only utter various generally accepted statements about non-discrimination in immigration and propose an immigration board. All this has been kicking around for many years.

These things are undoubtedly worth consideration. But the sad part of this tendency is that there is an equal and opposite proclivity to leave out really important problems.

This year everyone recognizes "the importance of the existence of 'le fait Canadien français' in Canada", to quote the March for Canada brief. It would undoubtedly surprise many people to learn that last year only two of the five campus parties mentioned that problem in their platforms, the Liberals and the Communists.

Perhaps it was not as important then as it is now. But somehow I think it should have received more consideration even in those days.

Two issues which certainly could have been used this year are taxation reform and legal care.

Taxation reform is currently one of the most important problems facing the country. We are taxed by at least four levels of government. We pay income, corporation, property, and sales taxes, import, export and succession duties, among others. A reform is needed. Everyone agrees.

comment

The radicals say abolish all of them except income, corporation and succession duties. The reactionaries say abolish the progressive income tax and succession and corporation taxes, but increase the sales tax.

Regardless of what opinion any one person may hold, these proposals certainly warrant discussion. Oh no, say the student politicians. A royal commission is now studying the problem and we're not sure of the results.

But surely this does not preclude discussion. If you ask them about free trade they say that they aren't too sure of all its results. But they don't recommend appointing a royal commission for this topic.

The fact is that the campus political clubs are unwilling or unable to do deep thinking on complicated problems.

And they are just as reluctant to pick up new ideas and shape them into a meaningful political program. Legal care has recently come under consideration. Its adherents claim that it is as necessary as Medicare. They say that if we are to have justice the laws must be equally accessible to everyone without financial loss. Surely this is an idea which is compatible with either the Liberal or New Democratic philosophy. But neither of them have proposed legal care this year.

Unlike most older issues, legal care does not have a host of different solutions proposed by various professional politicians from which the Model Parliamentarians may pick and choose. This would require original thought, and original thought is not the forte of campus politicians. (For instance, why were there so few campus party executives among the organizers of the March for Canada.)

Some think that the SAC Model Parliament changes this year make the institution into an ordinary debating society instead of a parliament. Others disagree.

But it is quite clear that no amount of fiddling with the rules of procedure, indeed nothing whatsoever, will make that institution any more meaningful until campus politicians drop the social aspect of their organizations and face squarely up to real issues, examine them closely, and think deeply.

Memos from the pit

By KEN DRUSHKA

A section of last Monday's editorial, Academic Barriers, which dealt with encroachments on academic freedom in St. Michael's College has provoked comment from St. Michael's students and faculty members.

The editorial stated that St. Michael's students, particularly philosophy students, are prevented from reading certain books and coming in contact with certain ideas.

Several philosophy students from the college have either written or come in person to report that they have never had any restrictions imposed upon them.

They said they are able to read what they wish and that any books listed on the Index of the Roman Catholic Church can freely be borrowed from the library.

When asked about the restrictive advice given to students by some professors and priests, the students said the final decision still remained with the individual student, and if the advice not to read a particular book was taken the student concerned was merely curtailing his own freedom.

So it appears that our unqualified statement about restrictions on academic freedom at St. Michael's was wrong. But, after further questioning of some students it turns out that while we may have missed the mark, we were aiming in the right direction.

On the basis of the criticism we received, we asked some of the students if they thought there was any encroachment on academic freedom at St. Michael's. "Yes," they replied, but said it was a more subtle restriction than indicated in the Varsity editorial.

Apparently, then, we erred in taking a few isolated cases of direct restriction as a general situation. We had based our editorial on a limited number of conversations with St. Michael's students who said they had been advised not to read, for example, the Confessions of Jean Jacques Rousseau.

Some of the students who have come in this week, while admitting that Rousseau and Voltaire are not viewed with great favor, stated they have read these books without incurring the disfavor of faculty or administrative members.

Some of the students who came in to see us said the subtle restrictions imposed at St. Michael's are the type which allow almost unlimited freedom of expression within the classroom, but which prevent the free expression of these ideas and their implications by college members outside the college.

Briefly—and this too is probably a generalization which will be disputed by example—students and faculty members are relatively free to read, think and say what they like in the confines of the classroom. But the traditionally Thomist administration and faculty members frown upon many of these statements when they are made outside the college confines.

The best illustration of this statement is that every St. Michael's student we have encountered who admits the situation refuses to write anything under his name or allow his name to be used in connection with an article on academic freedom at the college.

Le grand Charles

"The vocation of France is to remain not only a nation but also a power. There is no French nation without aspiration to a certain grandeur."

(Michel Debre)

This time last year the French elections were just over. The French people had been thrown into a dilemma first time while speaking which I discovered for the first time with a Frenchman in a cafe.

"Oh how I hate de Gaulle," he cried.

"You are going to vote against him?" I asked.

"No," he replied with usual Gallic intensity, "I am going to vote for him. That is why I hate him so much. Oh how I hate de Gaulle."

This is essentially the dilemma facing de Gaulle himself. How does one rule a country in which the national pastime is being in opposition? One answer to this question comes to mind: be in opposition yourself.

Thus de Gaulle is often characterized more by what he is against than what he is for on the presumption that what he is for is known only to him and God, with a close identity between the two. There is a very real sense in which it can be said that he is "against the government," if by government we mean that body of politicians who make up countless political parties in the French Assembly. Or, if we mean a certain process in which one must compromise, devise ideological platforms, fight, wait, hesitate, frustrate and be frustrated. For the general's frustration point is very low, and through a series of political manoeuvres based on a realistic assessment of the French temperament of which he is a prime example, he eliminated that body of politicians, the parties and the frustration process.

How could it happen? Raymond Aron offers us one conclusion. He says that a friend of his preferred "a government whose ideas he disagreed with but was presided over by General de Gaulle to a government whose ideas he shared, but was deprived of a 'guide supreme'. If politically sophisticated electors have reached the stage of resolutely placing a person above ideas, can one wonder that millions of ordinary Frenchmen did the same?"

The French people, having had their fill of the "politics of ideas" in the Fourth Republic, and caught between their love of controversy and their desire for practical action, found the answer to this dilemma in a man of both ideas and action. Thus de Gaulle appears, in the words of Jean-Paul Sartre, as "the synthesis of all our contradictions."

DE GAULLE'S RISE TO POWER

In 1956 the Count of Paris predicted that de Gaulle would return to power and that "power would fall into his lap like an overripe fruit". In May, 1958, after a period of negotiations (if that is the proper term) the general was begged to take over the government on his own condi-

France, his friends, and to the principles, basically conservative in nature which De Gaulle was supposed to have held, and worst of all, by acquiescing in the desire of the Communists and the French left wing in general for decolonization, he allowed the rise of the Communists in France — from complete annihilation in 1958 to a position of major political importance in 1962, Soustelle says:

"Since its (de Gaulle's policy) ultimate objective is the creation of a European bloc, reaching from Paris to Moscow, it is clear that this policy, in order to succeed, must keep open the bridges leading to the Kremlin, even at the risk of a dangerous strain on relations with America".

Soustelle predicts that de Gaulle will ultimately sign a treaty with Moscow, thus consolidating Communist power in France and testifying to the tragic misunderstanding that de Gaulle has of international communism.

During the Algerian crisis,

WILLIAM SHEARSON, a University of Toronto philosophy lecturer who recently spent a year studying in Paris, writes on Gaullist France. This is the first of two articles.

tions: a new constitution of his own making, giving him enormous powers. In retrospect, it is clear that although France brought de Gaulle from retirement for the express purpose of doing something about a current malady, he saw this situation as the means of realizing his long range plans for France, as outlined in his Memoires.

His decision to cast Algeria "free" shocked the very men who had brought him to power for the purpose of keeping Algeria French — a shock which led to the formulation of the OAS. Thus, Jacques Soustelle portrays his old friend as a traitor to de Gaulle consolidated his power. Governing by decree under the sweeping emergency power given to him by himself, thousands of French officers and civilians were arrested without specific charge and held without trial. Magazines were repressed and newspapers censored. De Gaulle himself based his rule solely on his relationship to the people by direct plebiscite. Paris was under threat of air attack at any moment. The emergency was total, and so was power of Charles de Gaulle.

Then came the Evian accord. France relaxed but de Gaulle's restrictions did not

He knew well that it would be disastrous for his future if he allowed reports on the atrocities in Algeria to be widely circulated. Personal property was being seized, and incalculable acts of violence were committed. But in the meantime, Gaullist France was on the move. The General announces his referendum for "Oct. 28," 1962, in which the French people would vote to have the president of the republic elected by popular vote in the future; a proposition expressly forbidden by de Gaulle's own constitution.

The referendum on Algeria was worded in such a way that a simple "yes" endorsed all of de Gaulle's policies, past, present, and future. The referendum of "Oct. 28" was worded to refer explicitly to the future election of the president. But this was certainly not all that the referendum entailed. As this was a vote on changing Articles 6 and 7 of the constitution, it meant that constitutional change could be made by a simple majority of the people. Fear of this consequence led to the defeat of the government last fall.

The collapse was swift and dramatic. The leaders of each party spoke late into the night. Some, like Paul Reynaud, spoke with an immense eloquence and conviction, denouncing de Gaulle as the destroyer of the very meaning of constitutional government. Others, seeing in the referendum the destruction of their little morsels of power dependent upon the disunity in the assembly, attacked de Gaulle as a high priest of the personality cult. With the Communists, it was not a constitutional issue, but rather a realisation that as long as de Gaulle was in, any legislative influence that they had would be destroyed. The entire left wing, unable to vote for de Gaulle and seeing that this referendum rendered the assembly impotent, was placed in this predicament.

From this point on, everything that the political parties did, constituted added evidence for de Gaulle's contention that they were more interested in their political skins than in the future of their country. As the elections approached, the left wing parties scurried around trying to find some means of avoiding the total collapse of their influence. The Socialist leader, Guy Mollet, called for his supporters to swing their votes to Communist candidates on the second ballot if it appeared that defeat of the Socialist candidate was certain.

The other parties sensing almost certain defeat, and sensing also that to attack de Gaulle was to make political points for him, put up no

BOOKS:

Poor biography but good history

By PAUL STEVENS

William Lyon Mackenzie King, 1924-1932: The Lonely Heights. By H. Blair Neatby, University of Toronto Press; 1963; Pp. 452; $7.95.

This is the second of the proposed four-volume official biography of William Lyon Mackenzie King. In 1950 the Literary Executors of Mr. King's estate decided to make his papers available for the preparation of a biography and subsequently appointed Professor R. MacGregor Dawson to undertake the project. After Professor Dawson's death, Dr. H. Blair Neatby agreed to complete this volume together with a third volume covering the years up to 1939.

It is to the credit of Dr. Neatby that he has not succumbed to the usual practice of official biographers of producing a purely laudatory account of his subject. Dr. Neatby's special interest had been in the Laurier period and it is not surprising that upon first approaching the subject he should view Mr. King with some distaste in comparison to his more gracious and less compromising predecessor.

Dr. Neatby clearly has not changed his opinion of Mr. King as an individual, but he has come to respect him as a politician. He has written an admirable, thoroughly documented political study. He has, however, written a less admirable biography.

As Dr. Neatby makes clear, Mr. King's desire for power was central in a life barren of the human companionship one feels he so fervently desired. For Mr. King, perhaps subconsciously, the lust for power became more of an end than a means. He subordinated whatever principles he had to this end.

Foremost of his political principles was a sincere belief in conciliation. As Deputy Minister in the Department of Labour, as Minister of Labour in the Laurier cabinet between 1909 and 1911, and as an industrial consultant during the war years, his work had been that of a conciliator. Likewise in politics, he was always guided by his belief that "in all difficult situations... there must be a point somewhere at which a proper balance can be effected."

As Dr. Neatby excellently demonstrates, Mr. King's assiduous courtship of the Progressives between 1921 and his attempts to balance their interests with those of the protectionist elements in the Liberal Party was a gargantuan exercise in the execution of this principle. He was the master of compromise, and in difficult political situations, until a fair compromise presented itself, he did nothing.

Mr. King held a healthy regard for the Canadian political party system. He believed that the system operated at its highest efficiency when there were but two political parties in the House of Commons, and as a result, consistently resisted the demands of the Progressives to amend the Elections Act by introducing the alternative vote on the grounds that the result would be to strengthen a third party. While in office he saw himself as the embodiment of the will of all the people; towards election time he tended to see the political parties as embodying the will of the two groups which he saw in Canadian society—the Conservative Party that of the "interests", and the Liberal Party the will of those who opposed the interests.

Mr. King, however, was not averse to invading the realm of the "interests" if by so doing he might strengthen his party and heighten his chances of electoral success. His invitation to Herbert Marler, a wealthy Montreal business man, and Vincent Massey, president of the Massey-Harris Company to join his cabinet in 1925 is evidence of this fact.

Mr. King, however, was most ambivalent (one might better say expedient) in his analysis of where the supreme power rested in the Canadian system. Though his party was but the second largest group in the Commons after the election of 1925, he justified his decision to hold on to the reins of power on the grounds that only by meeting parliament could "the supreme right of the people to govern themselves" be recognized.

On the other hand, he had inherited from his grandfather a somewhat fuzzy notion of the old Grit and Jacobinical principle that power resides in the people and may be exercised directly by them.

Thus, less than a year after the election in 1925, rather than face the defeat of his government in the Commons, and the relinquishment of the prime ministership and control of the electoral machinery to Arthur Meighen; he advised the Governor-General to dissolve parliament because an appeal to the people was "an appeal to a higher court from which parliament derives its authority".

In the realm of Imperial relations, Mr. King held firmly to the belief that Canada was a self-governing Dominion. This principle he applied vigorously during the Chanak incident, during the negotiations over the Halibut Fisheries Treaty, and at the Imperial conference in 1923 and 1926.

He had no intention of disrupting the unity of the British Empire, but he did wish to prevent the British Government from imposing responsibilities on Canada.

Yet even the principle of Canadian autonomy he was willing to subordinate to the maintenance of political power. In 1926 he advised Lord Byng to consult British authorities as to whether he was obliged to accept the advice of his prime minister.

Nonetheless, while Dr. Neatby has admirably portrayed Mr. King as a politician par excellence, there are limitations to his political study of the man. In certain cases his research might have been more thorough. One the basis of earlier works on the subject, one suspects that the opposition to Mr. King from within his own party after the election of 1925 was much deeper and more significant than the author would have us believe. In a later chapter, Dr. Neatby denies the traditional interpretation that the election of 1926 was decided solely on the constitutional issue, and points out that Mr. King's wooing of the Progressives over the preceding five years was an important factor.

William Lyon Mackenzie King on his 75th birthday, Dec. 17, 1949, seven months before he died.

It is true that for the first time the Progressives faced the real possibility of a government headed by Arthur Meighen whom they considered most unfriendly to their cause. Dr. Neatby's evidence, however, for his conclusion that the Progressive vote was most significant is far from conclusive. In his analysis of the election results for example, he fails to show exactly where the Progressive vote was decisive.

In addition, Dr. Neatby in some cases remains too uncritical of his subject. He refuses to comment upon Mr. King's political wisdom in seeking dissolution in 1926.

Politically this was not a wise decision. Though his budget of that year was a most popular one, the revelations of the special committee investigating irregularities in the Customs Department had helped to produce a climate of opinion most unfavourable to the Government. Had the Governor-General accepted the advice of his first minister, and Mr. King had every reason to expect that he would, his chances of success at the polls were certainly not very bright.

It was only when Lord Byng did the unexpected and refused to accept his minister's advice that Mr. King was able to raise the constitutional issue as an emotional rallying cry. Dr. Neatby might well argue as indeed he does that the importance of the constitutional issue in the election of 1926 has been greatly exaggerated. Nonetheless, whereas Progressives could support Mr. King when the constitutional crisis tended to obscure the government's earlier difficulties, they would have found it much more difficult to render that support had the issues been those of customs scandal and political corruption.

Once again, one feels that Dr. Neatby is too uncritical of Mr. King over his handling of the Beauharnois Scandal. It is hard to believe that he was unaware, as the author indicates, as to the sources of party funds.

Nevertheless, as a political study, this volume is a most valuable contribution to Canadian historiography. As a biography, however, the book is somewhat disappointing. We learn very little of Mr. King as an individual, of Mr. King apart from the political scene. Occasionally the author becomes aware of this fact and writes a few pages about the more personal side of Mr. King's life. He soon forgets this aspect of Mr. King, however, and once again continues his political analysis. Thus, while the volume will stand as a model for Mr. King's political career, there is still a need for a more Creightonesque study of Canada's most successful politician.

A potpourri of Canadian novels

By BARB AMIEL

Fasting Friar by Edward McCourt; McClelland and Stewart; 222 pages; $4.50. The favorite Game by Leonard Cohen; Secker & Warburg; 223 pages; $4.00. From Heaven With A Shout by Patricia Blondal; McClelland and Stewart; 180 pages.

It is quite apparent that the world of Canadian letters needs Lucky Jim without delay, complete with the crazy-pesant and shot-in-the-back faces. Or even the furtive snickers that could be the beginning of a sense of humour.

Of course it doesn't need his educational background. If there is one thing Canadian authors have it's a good education. Take Edward McCourt for example.

A Rhodes scholar to Oxford from the University of Alberta, an ex-teacher at Ridley and our own Upper Canada College, a lecturer at Queen's and the University of New Brunswick and now Professor of English at the University of Saskatchewan. And his fifth novel "Fasting Friar" is set guess where? In the English department of "one of the less fashionable Canadian universities" — undoubtedly a reference to the Maritime university scene.

With such a background it really is a shame Professor McCourt can't write a novel, though his ability to get his work published is impressive. "Fasting Friar" is a work of unparalleled mediocrity.

Apparently it is about academic freedom and that sort of a thing. Should Professor Ettinger be fired because he has written a salacious novel? The question is clearly pertinent to Professor McCourt who has written a peeping-tom novel.

The behind-the-ivy-walls scenes do raise some interesting questions about the universities Professor McCourt has been associated with, or perhaps more pointedly they throw light on the undergraduate fantasies he has never been able to drop gracefully. Perhaps that is why he became an academic. The life must be a disappointment to him.

What reality can match Professor McCourt's description of Miss Pengeley, Dean of Women and lecturer in the English department, the evening after a seminar?

"She lay stretched at full length, her tousled head propped up by pillows in the arm of an elderly owl-faced specialist in linguistics. A Chaucerian sprawled across the foot of the bed. With one hand he held a glass, with the other he caressed Miss Pengeley's legs . . . she lay giggling quietly and running her finers through the linguist's sparse hair.

The Chaucerian's hand reached Miss Pengeley's stocking-tops. Her pink thighs quivered. Dr. Bailey woke up and blinked rheumy eyes.

"Ah, Miss Pengeley—playing both ends against the middle?"

There is no laughing at the expense of Leonard Cohen. He demands to be taken seriously, although he does rather set his readers on edge with what must qualify as the year's most pretentious autobiographic sketch on the back dust-jacket, coupled with a sombre black and grey photo of Mr. Cohen doing his best to look like Pasternak.

Though leaning rather more to picturing himself as the wandering Jew, Cohen does admit to a traditionally North American education. McGill and Columbia and to round things out — a home in Montreal to which he always returns "scene of the steep streets which support the romantic academies of Canadian Poesy."

His poetry received deserved critical attention. His novel is not quite so deserving, though fellow Jews of Mr. Cohen's pre-European days, who remember him simply as a camp counsellor, are discovering the hitherto ignored significance of camp experiences on the pages of "The Favorite Game."

The novel traces the development of a Lawrence Breavman, scion of a wealthy Westmount family and would-be Stephen Dedalus. Everything is fine while descriptions of childhood trauma and vividly captured slices of adolescence are being dished up. The trouble begins when sex becomes more than wet-dreams and freshman boastings. Soon it's all tied up with the search for something and every page is another spiritual and physical strip-tease. And the writing becomes cloying and runs out of control.

What Cohen does manage to convey with incredible skill, is the smell and fibre of the relationship between Lawrence Breavman and his closest friend, Krantz. It is successful in part because it escapes the continual searchlight and dissection that the hetero-sexual relationships come in for. Sometimes you just have to discipline your sensitivity Mr. Cohen.

And what Cohen manages to avoid talking about is to his credit. It is after all an accomplishment to write a book in North America, in the latter half of the twentieth century, with a Jewish protagonist, set in a quasi-Jewish environment and refrain from coating every page with gefilte fish.

Patricia Blondal died in 1959, a young woman with one book "A Candle to Light the Sun" that had just been accepted for publication. "From Heaven With a Shout" was apparently discovered in manuscript form after her death.

Mrs. Blondal attended the University of Manitoba where "she is remembered for her brilliance in English and Philosophy". It is certainly a professional piece of writing. In fact it is so smoothly handled that no matter how wildly improbable the plot development becomes, and Mrs. Blondal can give Professor McCourt a run for his money in this area, the reader is not the least perturbed, but remains quite willing to take all in his stride and carry on.

For a few brief pages the story takes place in England where a young English widow answers an agony column advert:

MILLIONAIRE CANADIAN DESIRES WIFE, WILL PAY TEN THOUSAND POUNDS. WRITE BROWN'S HOTEL FULL PARTICULARS, PICTURE, C/O LAMOND.

Sure enough she gets the position and then it's off to British Columbia to a typical Canadian rural emotional spiderweb complete with identical twins possessed of one soul and possessed by one woman (not the English widow — this is where the plot thickens), an unconvincing potential nymphomaniac "I wanted to be like Lady Brett" and Junior League cocktail affairs.

Predictability enough all ends in complete disaster. Which should be a lesson to anyone who is contemplating the personal column.

It is always easy to be glib about a book. The unfortunate aspect of this particular book is that one can't help suspecting so much more could have been achieved by the author in her subsequent work, had she lived.

There is no sign here of the volatile searchings of the talented Leonard Cohen. But there are glimpses of a nontheless sensitive, cool and searching eye akin to Katherine Mansfield, though any direct comparison would be absurd.

Perhaps the university background is antipathetic to a sense of humour, in spite of Leacock. Because that seems to be the missing ingredient. Or perhaps it's the Canadian climate or the fact that we have suffered too little. Whatever it is, apart from Farley Mowat's new book, we seem peculiarly devoid of humour. And he had to write about wolves.

A sprinkling of snuff

By BRONWYN DRAINE

Take a completely ridiculous plot, add a brilliant array of bawdy courtesans, lucrative libertines, and cuckolded husbands, and sprinkle generously with snuff, fluttering fans and witty dialogue: and there you have William Congreve's delightful Restoration comedy, The Double-Dealer. The University Alumnae production of this classic at the Coach House Theatre, directed by Peter Brockington, lives up fully to the standards of this demanding masterpiece of wit and farce.

Despite Lady Froth's (Charlotte Holmes) remonstrance in her opening speech: "Critics avant!", we decided to stay around for the entire play; and, although it was rather difficult to keep hold of the plot's many strings, especially in the first act, it was relaxing to watch a play of "good dirty fun" in a completely objective way.

The plot is unbelievably complex. Two serious young lovers strive to get married, fantastically hindered and helped by as colorful, brainless and sex-conscious a bunch of characters as ever graced the floorboards. No less than three aging matrons are carrying on illicit affairs before their slow-witted husbands' eyes. One of these triangles: Lady Froth, "a great Coquette; Pretender to poetry, wit and learning," Mr. Brisk "a pert Coxcomb," and Lord Froth, "a solemn Coxcomb," are truly a delight to behold.

The villain, a brooding Iago prototype who gives the play its title (played by Thomas Hoisveen) seems slightly out of place in the general frivolity of the piece, perhaps because he is too real in such an incredible situation. But eventually, love triumphs, the villain gets his, and in some magical way, the whole mess of amorous intrigues in straightened out.

Director Peter Brockington has handled the play with a light and imaginative touch, and keeps it moving at a whirlwind pace. All the actors are witty, silly or evil to just the right degree. With one or two exceptions, they manage to carry off Congreve's marvelously complicated dialogues and soliloquies with great success. Patricia Carroll Brown, although a little too young and attractive for the part of the grotesque Lady Plyant, is one of the brightest spots in the show.

The Coach House Theatre itself is the perfect setting for this intimate drawing-room farce, and the simple set is extremely effective. The colorful costumes and delightful chamber music which accompanies most of the action, set the play off well.

The Double-Dealer is a must for students of Congreve, and an entertaining evening for all and sundry.

The Lady's last chance

By RAY WYLIE

Making her third and final call on Toronto, My fair lady opened at the O'Keefe Centre Nov. 25 and is due to stay until Dec. 14.

It is difficult to know how to approach such a venerable and well-loved figure, for during the past seven or eight years she has been charming audiences all over the world. The most successful musical ever produced, My Fair Lady created new standards of criticism in the field of musical comedy.

In assessing the present production at the O'Keefe, we must realize that the cast is competing against the now-legendary fame of Julie Andrews, Rex Harrison, and Stanley Holloway. Nevertheless, I think that the present group manages to hold their own, due in no small part to the innate excellence of the play itself.

Gayle Byrne is the second American actress to play Eliza Doolittle, and gives an enjoyable performance. She has vivacious good looks, an enthusiastic approach and an excellent lyric voice, strong yet flexible.

Leland Howard is not so successful in the role of Professor Henry Higgins, for his voice has a tendency to go flat with the result that he often ends up simply mouthing the lyrics. He gave his best singing performance in the final song "I've Grown Accustomed to Her Face," and at the same time conveyed something of the dramatic power of this important scene.

Charles Victor, in his portrayal of Alfred P. Doolittle, Eliza's wayward father, was easily the show-stopper. He gave an excellent performance of this superb role, and readily drew the audience's spontaneous applause by the warmth of his own personality.

Eric Brotherson as Colonel Pickering, and Margaret Bannerman as Mrs. Higgins both handled their parts well, but Richard Young's voice was insufficient to do his role justice. As Freddy Eynsford-Hill, he certainly looked the part of a young Victorian dandy, but his voice strained and cracked when called upon to reach the higher notes.

Hanya Holm's choreography still remains an enjoyable part of the evening, and her troupe was able to dance with the freshness and vivacity which makes the numbers exciting to watch. Cecil Beaton's original costumes are still in service, and fill their role very well indeed.

The truly great disappointment of the evening was Oliver Smith's set design. Whereas he was superb in The Girl Who Came to Supper, his scenery in this production of My Fair Lady was utterly tragic.

This is no doubt due to the fact that the show has been on the road for so many years, and that Toronto is its last stop before folding, but these sets were a disgrace to the taste of the audience.

Dull and decayed, mere canvas flats twisted and warped, the whole construction wavered and swayed each time a scene changed, or when an actor leaned too heavily against a wall. Mr. Smith, I am sure, would be embarrassed at the mere mention of this betrayal of his artistry.

Nevertheless, if you have never seen My Fair Lady, I would urge you to see this production. It certainly is not the best Lady to have graced the O'Keefe, but it is probably the last, and for this reason alone I recommend it. Although Lerner and Loewe's masterpiece can stand alone, the present cast manage to convey a good deal of its brilliance, and Gayle Byrne and Charles Victor give memorable performances in their own right.

When the curtain falls Dec. 14, My Fair Lady will end her first life, but she has, I am sure, at least eight more to go.

A case for cremation

Presumably prodded into a corner by much recent criticism of funeral directors, the Metropolitan Toronto members of the Ontario Funeral Service Association now are engaged in a lengthy and expensive defence of their activities.

A series of four weekly advertisements in Toronto newspapers is half completed. The headline on the ads says: "Facts About FUNERAL SERVICE Every Family Should Know."

Here are some more facts about funeral service every family should know. You won't find these in the ads. They're taken from A. O. Spriggs' textbook on embalming. I quoted them in The Varsity about four years ago.

"The fixing of the features is one of the most important parts of the preparation," Spriggs says, with a clinical and businesslike attitude that would indicate a certain feebleness in the current advertisements' claim that it's really only the religious significance a funeral director worries about.

Frequently the cheeks must be filled out with cotton or plastic surgery wax placed in the cheeks in small rolls and kneaded into shape from the outside.

The mouth is usually closed by tying the upper teeth to the lower ones. If the corpse has no teeth, the mouth can be kept closed by tying a thread through the lower jaw and the septum of the nose. That operation is carried out with a "large, strong, half-curved needle" or a bone drill can be used to make holes in the upper and lower jaws. Or a metal tack with a wire attached can be driven into the bone by a "needle injector."

The lips are cross-stitched and padded with wax. Cotton is forced under the eyelids to help keep them shut. Then massage cream is applied that will hold the lids together "until chemical reaction is sufficient to do so, and it will also tend to prevent drying and browning at the edges of the eyelids."

The actual embalming is accomplished by opening one main artery and one main vein. Embalming fluid, containing formaldehyde, salts, dyes, glycerine and preservative fluid, is pumped into the artery. It penetrates almost every tissue cell in the body, and the blood it replaces flows out the vein.

A normal adult needs about four gallons of fluid.

There's another problem. When the body dies, bacilli in the intestines do not die. The embalming fluid doesn't kill them either.

A large hollow needle called a "trocar" injects a powerful disinfectant into the trunk cavity and organs. Without this technique, advanced decomposition would not be evident for several days — or until the body is buried. But Spriggs tells us that embalmers have a moral obligation "to the people we serve" to carry out the cavity treatment. So you can be fairly sure your body will go underground with half a dozen trocar holes in it, sewn up with thread.

There is a ghastly section in the Spriggs text on the poisoning of children's bodies in the coffin:

"One of the most effective layouts that I have ever seen was that of the body of a six-year-old child lying on the right side with the right hand under the cheek, and with the left elbow bent so that the left forearm lay across the front of the body. It was a natural posture of a tired child in natural restful slumber. Children's funerals offer the finest possibilities for excellent work and material should be left undone in the work of preparation."

Another writer confesses that embalming children "will furnish the progressive funeral director an excellent opportunity to increase his prestige among his clientele. Numerous cases are recalled where this treatment has earned the gratitude of bereaved families, and this is particularly true in cases where the mother survived but a few days. It made it possible to place the baby's body in the mother's arms in the casket."

So let the funeral directors prattle on about freedom of choice. Let them gloss over the grimness of embalming and the absurdity of trying to make a corpse look "natural"—their favorite word—and let them dismiss supporters of cremation as "professional critics of funeral directors who are advocating the quick disposal of the dead without benefit of religious services."

The configuration is this: embalming versus cremation. The religious service, with which we do not quarrel, is apart from the configuration. The funeral directors seek to have the public identify religion with embalming. They are hypocrites and liars.

THE WEAVERS

LAST STAND

By DAVID SECTER

While hootenannies ravage the country, the group responsible for the folk song boom is about to disband. After 15 years of Carnegie Hall, best-selling records, and blacklists, the Weavers give their last Canadian concert at Massey Hall this Saturday.

The group was organized by Pete Seeger in 1948, and soon became the top attraction on the Greenwich Village circuit. Their first hit record Goodnight Irene was followed quickly by On Top of Old Smoky, The John B. Salls and songs of labor from all parts of the globe.

When the Korean War played midwife to America's worst political aberration, McCarthyism, the Weavers were denounced as Communists before the House UnAmerican Activities Committee, placed on the blacklist, and found all of their bookings cancelled.

The quartet split up and followed separate paths until they got together for a reunion concert in Carnegie Hall during Christmas week, 1955. The Weavers catapulted back into public prominence, but the mass media has always been closed to them. CBC is the only television network to feature the Weavers and Pete Seeger.

By this time Seeger had emerged into a leading soloist and pivot of the folk song revival. Unable to keep up both careers, he left the Weavers in 1958 and was replaced by Erik Darling. Four years later Darling left and Frank Hamilton joined Lee Hays, Ronnie Gilbert, and Fred Hellerman to form the present quartet.

A little greyer and paunchier than when they started, the Weavers still produce one of the sweetest folk sounds in America. See them before they swell the rout of "former stars".

Varsity on the air

By DAVID SECTER

"John O'Leary here and Town and Gown, the program that explores the university and its students".

This "intro" is heard every Sunday night at 7 on CBL, 740 on the dial. Now in its fourth year, the show aims to help bridge the gap between the layman (Town) and the campus (Gown).

The season traditionally opens with President Bissell's address to the freshmen, and then examines sundry nooks and crannies in this cloistered world. The Lady Godiva Memorial Band blasted away on one show, and a wind tunnel in the Aerophysics Lab howled on another. Besides U of T, programs have originated from York, McMaster, Trent, and as remote an institution as the University of Mexico.

Town and Gown has exposed some fascinating intricacies of the college mind. One program on The Opposite Sex revealed that co-eds come to University for the express purpose of meeting eligible degrees (not exactly front-page news), while many of the men prefer working females.

Dr. Murray Edwards, producer of Town and Gown as well as The Learning Stage, is particularly interested in political activity on campus. He finds that Model Parliament is a good indication of political trends in the nation.

This Sunday Town and Gown is broadcasting from the dank catacombs of The Varsity office. Editor Ken Drushka will explain the editorial policy of the paper. Some of the reactions to Mr. Drushka's controversial Remembrance Day editorial will be heard.

Dec. 15 Town and Gown will present the views of two undergrads from Boston who were in Toronto for the Harvard Exchange. The two "ex-changers" have some astute observations on the differences between American and Canadian educational systems.

The CBC is anxious to give as many students as possible experience in radio and television. Talented university students are encouraged to audition for variety shows and drama. Educational programs such as Town and Gown and The Learning Stage try to use students as resource material in their special fields.

CBC requires the best educated minds in Canada if they are to continue offering first-rate educational programs. At the present there is no way for interested university students to learn about the opportunities in broadcasting, but CBC has tentative plans to set up a training program.

Show of Contrasts

By PAUL RUSSELL

The various aspects of the modern city have provided subject material for American art for more than half a century now. The ash-can School with its objective chronicles of a rather shoddy city life, shocked the public into taking off the rose-colored glasses of academic sentimentality. During the depression years urban themes reappeared in the form of social protest. The city was no longer viewed objectively, but blamed for the failure of the American dream.

Currently the theme has been taken up by some pop artists who satirize the hackneyed visualizing of a public which is conditioned by urban commercialism. The Arnold Rockman exhibition "Random Cries of a City" is a distant cousin of this strain of pop art.

A more individual comment on urban life may be seen currently in the works of New York's Hershenson currently on view at the David Mirvish gallery. His paintings recall the shallow echo bouncing off concrete walls, the mustiness of decaying brick, and the foul smell of bus and car fumes. Children play in this concrete jungle, and scratch their humanly irrational chalkmarks on the rough walls (XOP15ABC).

These paintings are all done on wood. Occasionally the wood grain appears to enforce a pattern. Sometimes the blowtorch is applied, creating fascinating effects. The general technique is called encaustic and it results in a richly-textured, very hard surface peculiarly suitable to the theme of this series.

The immediacy of Hershenson's theme in our everyday life is emphasized by contrast with the paintings of Mont-real's Girard which are also on view at the gallery.

Girard is interested in the cosmos. His images suggest moon craters, sunbursts and large expanses of gaseous energy. Luminous floating masses appear on an opaque quiet space. Flashes of brilliant color burst across the picture plane and vanish. (Le Roi des Dieux).

While Hershenson remains in the city with us on earth, commenting upon our environment, Girard's imagination soars through the universe.

The exhibition continues until Dec. 29.

Le Roi des Dieux by Girard

fight at all. As Aron said: "Who really wanted a fight?" In the election everyone around the centre and the moderate right voted for de Gaulle. The left moved towards the Communists on the grounds that to vote against de Gaulle, one had to vote Communist. Therefore one Frenchman said to me: "If I must choose between being Gaullist or Red, I shall be Red."

And de Gaulle himself, in order to stimulate the proper sensibilities of his people, threatened to resign if the majority was not large enough.

Now firmly entrenched, de Gaulle set out to eliminate the last vestiges of militant opposition. He focused his sights on the cause of some 22 attempts on his life, the OAS. He arrested 13 men who had attempted to kill him at Petit-Clamart in the late summer of 1962. Three of these men were sentenced to death. De Gaulle, to show his spirit of generosity, commuted two of the sentences, but Bastien-Thiry, leader of the group, was shot.

The court in which the trial took place was one of the Tribunaux d'Exception, the courts set up by de Gaulle specifically to deal with terrorists after a civil court had failed to sentence to death a leader of the OAS. No longer do French intellectuals come forth to defend the tradition of impersonal political assassination. No longer must the country tolerate civil judges leading a courtroom singing of the Marseillaise as the defendant marches to freedom. Bastien-Thiry had hoped to be tried by civil court as the special military tribunal was to be disbanded before he came to trial. De Gaulle however, merely extended the life of 'his' court. The OAS had to learn that assassination was not acceptable to the France, just as the politicians and the people had learned that politics, indecision, political parties, and the rule of law, were remnants of the past.

The OAS broken, the assembly impotent, the constitution completely Gaullist and therefore meaningless, and with a fawning populace, de Gaulle's power is unchallenged except by unenlightened foreigners, and the possibility that the people could turn against him if he does not treat the coal miners properly.

I should like to comment on two aspects of this rise to power which do not speak for themselves. First, the only explanation for de Gaulle's sudden reversal of Algerian policy is that he considered Algeria dead weight, standing in the way, both politically and economically, of the role that he had set for France in the future. He certainly did not release Algeria to please the ideologists of decolonization. He has abundantly shown in his attitude to the United Nations, America and Britain, that he is not particularly neurotic about being loved by all and sundry. Therefore, those who cheered his "enlightened" Algerian policy, did so for the wrong reasons, which is why they cannot now reconcile his attitude toward Britain with his attitude toward Algeria.

Secondly, it should not be thought that de Gaulle's foreign policy plays an important role in French elections. As Raymond Aron has pointed out: "No electoral battle (in France) has ever been fought in the field of foreign policy." The only issues involved in last fall's elections were (a) the economic prosperity and growth of France, which presupposes (b) a great deal of political stability. It therefore has controversial nuclear policy becomes an election issue in the future, it will be considered on its merits for France; not whether it is a good thing for the world. It is solely an internal question, bearing on the considerations of prestige, security and independence. The French mind is not internationalist. Thus France will never make its foreign policy in the United Nations where it would be subject to the veto of her enemies, any more than she will allow a foreign nation such as Harvard University to make that policy for her.

Everything that de Gaulle has done during his rise to power, he has justified by an appeal to the national interest. Keeping in mind then the events that we have outlined, let us hear what he has to say in Volume III of his Memoirs:

"(L'etat n'est pas) une juxtaposition d'interets particuliers dont ne peuvent sortir jamais que de faibles compromis, mais bien une institution de decision, d'action, d'ambition, n'exprimant et ne servant que l'interet national."

But you will ask, who is to determine this "interet national"? Need one answer the obvious: "L'etat, c'est moi".

Tales from the Quarter

By LAWRENCE GARBER

The party on Git-lecoeur is a quiet fantasy in progress, an assembly of arms and legs in various poses of rest. It is in a tiny room on the eight floor of a nameless hotel, known ominously as 9. The following are present:

Chris M., known among his own as Bobby E. Lee: He is lazy, but that is not all. He comes from Manchester where his father is chief of police and he sells dope. He wants desperately to come from the American South and he has a Louisiana drawl that is quite pleasant. He does not know how to ask for things; he is a natural pimp. He pimps for cigarettes and he pimps for opinions. But he is innocent and wears a Huckleberry Finn hat and toeless running shoes. He gives the impression of brilliance disordered, but he is a calculating simpleton. He is laying on the one bed with his head on the one pillow and his arms about the one sheet. He is too young to be noticeable and he is too slight to be coy. In the gloom I can see his small eyes thinking. He often tells the story of the man who came up to his place to shoot heroin, mainlined, dropped dead. Poor Bobby E. Lee, boy saint, waited till nightfall, pecked up the body, staggered to the Quai Augustines and dropped it in the Seine. He wears sunglasses.

Sandra Y., white hope from the American Midwest: Her eyes are always sad and no amount of laughter is convincing. She is very soft. Her voice sounds like a breathless judgment; where her brows touch her nose, there is a gentle frown line. Everyone is fond of Sandra Y. for she is an affectionate creature; you feel that if you lit the top of her head she would burn like a candle and form a pool of wax about your feet. A week before, she was passing through Paris on her way to Strasbourg to meet her fiancée; she came to the Cafe Monaco and met many people. They took her to a club in the Rue Mazarine where Jules, the seducer, plays his guitar and sings through his nose. She was enraptured, it is her way of life. He offered her marijuana in his room and she thought that would be thrilling and new. She did not come down for three days. When she did, she was very different. At the moment, Sandra Y. is sitting on the arm rest of a small chair, somewhat in a daze. However, she will run away with a gypsy by Tangiers.

Stephen U., last vestige of Imperial Britain: His face is that of an Anglo-Saxon warrior. His head is covered with an enormous shock of straw-blond hair. He has a car. He has been educated at Cambridge, is a student of the Opera, and goes constantly barefoot. Whenever he speaks, ancient inflections bubble forth. At his best, he has that restful complacency of the Englishman; he finds women inconvenient, and is "just barely able really" to do his duty. Still, he has moments of hysteria; his car is wanted by the Paris police. He has been hiding it on sheltered sidewalks, and is trying to organize an excursion to the Loire Valley. As we appear, he is standing by the window stage left counting the chimneys; when he is finished, he will scratch

Bonnie, maternal scavenger from the Buckeye state: As a rule I am particular. Cleanliness is next to Godliness and Bonnie is filthy. She is filthy in a deliberate way; her neck is preserved in dry, caked mud and her feet smell like old turnips. But she is pretty and humble; her nostril wings flutter always and everyone knows she is compassionate. Her body is not profound. Indeed, she is quite thin and breastless; her legs are like stalks of celery and her face is as narrow as a pane of glass. Anne The Pregnat once wrote a play about two lovers in bed; she cast the parts herself and chose two transvestites so they could act as each other's understudy. Bonnie disapproved, and is unpopular. That does not mean that she is not well-liked.

Fitz, tall and West-Indian: Fitz is an abortionist. He is tall and likes parties. He stays under tables because he is too tall for small rooms. He smokes pot in the mornings and at night he steals purses. He will not steal purses from anyone he does not love; he restricts his crimes to the Paris Metros, deuxième classe. He is easily the safest man to know. He performs abortions often and uses a sterilized bicycle pump. To assure us of his credentials, he carries a CCM certificate. He wants to go to Manheim Germany so he can say "Manheim, Man." He says it now, but he knows it is not the same thing. He pimps for Germans in the Quarter hoping for a letter of introduction. He cures syphilis with herbs gathered at high noon on the banks of the Rhone river. Every morning he starts out for the American Express to greet his mail; he is always very high at that time, and everyday he gets lost. He is in partial view beneath a table; he wants desperately to go to Manheim, but he will run away with Nora to Barcelona instead. She will contact dysentery and they will not be happy.

Cheryl, dark beauty from the Carolinas, both North and South: She is tall and gangly like a Long Sam. She has been used so often and so callously by so many men from Gibraltar to Florence that, in her tragedy, she is beginning to resemble a garbage disposal unit. Her fatal downfall is her sense of charity; she gives herself like a balm to every wound. She is standing impaled against a wall as we approach her. I'd tell you more, but she has suffered enough.

The sound of surprise

By DAVID JACKEL

Last week's column by Phil Maude was a good example of the kind of writing which has given "traditional" jazz a bad name. Enthusiasm for the past and invective for the present do not provide an adequate basis for the defence of any particular kind of jazz.

Mr. Maude's article was an extremely unpleasant combination of historical half-truths and the worst kind of impressionist criticism. And as such it was a great disappointment, since I had expected a knowledgeable discussion of the many admirable aspects of "traditional" jazz. Instead Mr. Maude produced an abomination unmatched in its irrational partiality by anything Hugues Panassie ever wrote. Certain opinions to the contrary, I too like "traditional" jazz, and this liking makes imperative a reply to last week's critical abortion.

Some of you may have wondered at Mr. Maude's facile linking of "traditional" and "dixieland" jazz. What did he mean by this? Probably that he didn't know what he was talking about. Dixieland is a generic term for a type of music played mainly by white musicians in the northern United States after 1920. Traditional jazz, on the other hand, is a nebulous term that has come to include a number of things besides dixieland.

Within this broad classification are several schools of jazz, which anyone who has done some serious listening can distinguish. There are the barnyard noises of the early white groups, the rich-textured polyphony of the New Orleans bands, the carefully neat inventions of the New York school, the wide-open individualism of the Chicago jazzmen. In addition there are cross-influences and styles not so easily classified, all of which proves only that traditional jazz is far more complicated and diverse a music than Mr. Maude seems to think.

And all these various styles did not even exist at the turn of the century, but grew up over a span of more than 30 years. During this same period musicians such as Duke Ellington, Fletcher Henderson, Coleman Hawkins and Art Tatum were creating forms of jazz which no one has ever called traditional but which are older than some of the so-called "traditional" music we hear today. In many cases these men even influenced the dixielanders. Red Nichols, for example, has acknowledged the influence of Duke Ellington on his work of the late 1920's.

As for the theory that the basis of this music was "laid down by a relatively simple and uncomplicated society", who are you trying to kid, Mr. Maude? The New Orleans musicians spent their days riding in the backs of street-cars, and their nights working in gin-mills and brothels. Simple and uncomplicated, isn't it? Early New Orleans music contained irony and pathos, as well as good humor, and the blues didn't just mean a 12-bar musical form.

Later dixieland musicians had their problems too. Like working for gangsters in Chicago, or starving in New York. When Jack Teagarden sang "Lord, I'd rather drink muddy water, sleep in a hollow log than be up here in New York, treated like a dirty dog," he was more than a little serious. The music of these years was good in spite of the society, not because of it.

Not satisfied with presenting voluminous misinformation about traditional jazz, Mr. Maude goes on to characterize most modern jazz as "grating discord." Any ideas of his about the far-out nature of modern jazz harmonies would be stopped cold if he had ever listened casually to the music of Stravinsky.

Traditional jazz does indeed produce what were last week called "irrational devotees". Fortunately it also produces a few rational ones, people who have listened long and hard to the traditional jazz that's been recorded for the past 50 years and have learned to distinguish good from bad.

I agree with Mr. Maude that modern jazz does owe an immense debt to its past, but that doesn't mean that I have to listen to some characters trying to recreate this past. There's nothing colder than someone else's dead emotion, which is what most of these modern dixielanders seem to be trying to resurrect.

Wild Bill Davison is good (something I said two weeks ago) because dixieland is his style of music. He was playing it before I was born. But I wouldn't trade my copies of Louis Armstrong's Potato Head Blues, Jelly Roll Morton's The Chant, or even Bix Beiderbecke's Barnacle Bill the Sailor, for every note the Salt City Six has played in the last three weeks.

Mr. Maude has missed the point about jazz. He said that you can't expect everyone to be "creative and original." This is just what you do expect, and what jazz is basically all about. If you're not interested in creativity, you're not interested in jazz.

One thing that was mentioned last week did really get to me though. That sex-starved cornet of Davison's, you know, the one that's pleading "seductively for fulfillment." Well, I think we should find that cornet another cornet before it's too late. Then the two of them can settle down and raise a lot of little B-flat pocket trumpets, so that Don Cherry will have an unlimited supply. This will mean that Cherry won't have to worry about all those critics, who keep trying to take his horn away from him.

Ludwig's hero not submerged

By SUE LYONS

Last Friday in U.C.'s West Hall, Mr. Jack Ludwig, author of Confusions, born in Winnipeg and now head of the English department of the State University of New York, issued a refreshing call for the return of "celebration" to the work of novelists. Delivering his remarks with an ease and lucidity that brought an enthusiastic response from his audience, Mr. Ludwig spoke of the need to recognize a belief in human action as "the only tradition that can cope with this world."

Mr. Ludwig drew a distinction between the hero as underground man (the man who remains by choice in his hermetically-sealed world of despair, rejecting any notion of hope) and the hero as aboveground man (the man who still believes in the possibility of a meaningful dialogue with the world). Ludwig traced the underground man to Kafka's "vision of hopelessness, in which the hero faces the blank wall of the world — there is nothing on the other side, and there is no retreat." The scope of Tolstoy's work, on the other hand, provides the source for the above-ground hero, who can still communicate with the world in the hope of achieving communion, and possible triumph. His success is irrelevant; it is his attitude of hope that permits the dialogue in the first place.

Given this viewpoint, Mr. Ludwig had, understandably, few kind words for the "beats." "I have a kind of a private war on," he said, "with the supporters of the avant-garde." He contended that young writers today should realize two things: that they cannot imitate "the despair of Kafka without his real historical sense 'of futility' and that original work does not come from writing on the 'fashionable' themes simply because they are avant-garde and therefore necessarily meaningful.

"In Tolstoy, the world is condemned, but it is not given up on," Ludwig noted. The beat novelist always has to kill his hero off, because for him violence is the only answer — he is incapable of using his imagination to provide another solution. The beat writer says, "I failed, so the whole world has failed"; but the aboveground hero simply says, "I failed."

"So we have the uninformed, rapid bleedings of the beats, and it's all poseur stuff," Ludwig said.

However, Ludwig contends that there is another answer, what he calls the "post-violence investigation of this modern world." The above-ground hero's attitude to the world allows him like Joyce's Leopold Bloom in Ulysses to initiate the dialogue, which itself achieves its meaning in denial or acceptance — for even denial is a response. "The absurdity, the complexity, the magnificence and banality of this world — it's a twenty-four hour job just to keep up with it. The real horror of the last twenty years is so extreme that the expression of it is the most important literary function today."

The Ottawa folk scene

By BILL CAMERON

Say it's about 8:30 of a Monday night and you are wondering what you are doing in Ottawa, of all places, when you could be making it at the Embassy or drinking at the Pilot or something, and you don't have much chance of finding out, because the people who have been living in Ottawa since Confederation say that there's nothing happening but the tulips and Mounties. Or you are walking along Bank Street and reviewing the girls, who are groovy girls but all French or moral or expensive.

You have a problem, friend. Welcome to Le Hibou.

Le Hibou is a coffeehouse run by an insane poet named Hawkins and four or five very nice waitresses and a record store manager named Harvey Glatt. It looks like the Bohemian Embassy's orphan child, which (for all I know) it may be; it's a walkup from a joke shop and a confectionery; and it has the best folk music I have heard in Canada.

You make it up from the joke shop on a Monday night and you're in church. The performers are amateurs on Monday (weekend professionals are of the Purple Onion variety—Carolyn Hester, Sonny and Terry, et cetera) and, no matter what they sound like they are listened to in a responsive, polite silence. Wandering professionals have called this the best audience in Canada, and they may be — they know when to sing and when not to, and there are no finks at the back calling for an espresso for the house.

Le Hibou originally started by Ottawa University students looking for someplace to speak French without getting dirty looks from the waiter, and the bulk of its business still comes from the three Ottawa universities. Monday night performers are likely to be university students with $200 Martins and Carleton Engineering jackets. The most prominent are Ed Honeywell, a superb classical and flamenco guitarist who transcribed Bach for fun; Jamie Buell a good balladeer in the Jackie Washington style; and Nev Wells 20 guys named Hodgson, who sing bluegrass.

Le Hibou, 248 Bank St., a block north of Somerset. Make it up there next time you're trapped in Ottawa with the tulips out of season.

Embassy ventures miss the boat

By RAY WYLIE

With the help of some cans, plywood sheets, and bits of cloth, The Bohemian Embassy managed to launch two original one-act plays last week. A risky venture under any conditions, this particular effort strained to rise, faltered badly, and finally crashed in flames.

The first offering, A Ring for Flori, by David French, was an interesting little sketch of the parting of the ways. Eddie, a young man yearning for the sea, is forced to reject Flori, whom he loves somewhat vaguely, rather than enter blessed matrimony. Apart from some rather bitter comments concerning Toronto's exploited

Italian population, the author has little to say. Raymond Bellew was quite convincing as the disappointed young man, but Cecile Oldstein, who played his loving mistress, was hampered by the monotonous flatness of her voice, although she exuded feminine charm.

Eve Law's latest offering, David, got off to a good start. The first 10 minutes was composed of a series of amusing quips and comments, mostly concerning two room-mates' attitudes towards men. Zelda, played by Eve Law herself, has a good sense of bitter, sarcastic humor, but Starr, played by Janese Oliver, failed to convey much sense of anything.

Off to a reasonable start, the play completely collapsed when it lurched into a melodramatic display of Zelda's turbulent emotions, ensnared as they are in the net of lesbianism. It was not for many long minutes that the curtain saved the audience from this self-conscious spectacle.

Performed by the On-The-Spot/Off-Centre Theatre Groups, the two plays managed to miss the mark by a wide margin. If it's good theatre that you want this weekend, give the Bohemian Embassy a diplomatic snub

MUSIC

by DAVID S. BUNDLER

"It requires much time to discover musical Mediterranean seas; and still more to master their navigation."

BERLIOZ (1842)

Several weeks ago we had occasion to cite Stravinsky's scandalous admission that composers could not necessarily "hear" everything they wrote; it might now serve us further to discuss two implications, one metaphysical, the other musical.

Since man began to make his own music, whether in imitation of nature or as an attempt at articulation, his efforts and its results have been a great mystery to him.

As Prof. Fackenheim pointed out several weeks ago in a lecture on Nietzsche, it is a phenomenon that the created work enables its creator to transcend himself — power is defined in terms of the manifest creativity, (if man is recognized as an unfinished being.) The work of art assumes a life of its own which sets it apart from the contingencies of the creative process.

The point is that the increasing complexity of musical composition has not produced this estrangement between the artist and his work, for it has always existed. Our inability to "hear" plain chant is not fundamentally different from our inability to "hear" Le Marteau. (I am assuming that the artist and his cultural group are one and the same, the former being regarded as a contingency.)

Nonetheless, the combination of sounds and instruments has advanced to a point where saturation becomes a possibility and the inability to "hear" becomes a problem of musical acumen for both composer and listener. If Mahler or Strauss write for more lines than anyone can hear simultaneously (or which no conductor or orchestra can balance or electronic equipment) then should we not cry halt?

In the orchestra then have we not created a monster whose aesthetic growth is severely imperilled and must quickly take a new turning for survival?

When one thinks back to the subtlety of expression in the first introduction of the string vibrato, the crescendo in the Mannheim orchestra, the ethereal timelessness of the Japanese gagaku or court music, the bloated extravagance of the 20th century becomes intolerable.

But where was the turning point? Should Halevy have rejected the valve trumpet in 1835, should Ludwig have refused to except Wagner's expanded brass section, should Pfundt's timpani pedals have been scorned by Bulow? The contributing factors would doubtless fill many pages (and the transformation of instruments will continue), but the fact remains that the orchestra of the Western world cannot be further expanded without negating its own powers.

Stravinsky himself writes music with as clear a texture as anyone, and not by chance, does he seldom resort to contrapuntal exercises as musical solutions? Benjamin Britten too, abhors the thought of padding his orchestration. If since Berlioz, orchestration has become more free-wheeling and unmanageable, it is equally true that since Webern, a reaction has set in. Of course, both trends are still very much in evidence: major composers are still writing for large orchestra while the lessons of Webern are still being absorbed.

Whatever else he may be in 1963, the composer is first of all a craftsman who produces symbols of human experience by means of the medium in which he has powers of articulation. This being so, incoherence, vagueness and faulty technique cannot be useful to him except to denote failure.

* * *

N.B. The Salzburg Festival film of Don Giovanni is now showing at the International Cinema. The Mozart opera is conducted by Furtwängler and stars Cesare Siepi, Otto Edelmann and Lisa Della Casa.

Next week Russian cellist Rostropovich appears with the TSO playing the Shostakovich Concerto but not Strauss' Don Quixote as originally scheduled. Also of interest is the first local performance of Janacek's Taras Bulba.

A major event next week will likely be the concert to be given by the Hungarian String Quartet, Thursday evening at the Edward Johnson Building. The program will include the Five Movements for Strings by Webern and the Schubert "Death and the Maiden" quartet.

THIS IS THE WEEK THAT WILL BE THEATRE

Crest—Mr. Scrooge — a musical adaptation of Dickens for the holiday season.

O'Keefe—My Fair Lady — she's becoming middle-aged now and taking her last fling before she becomes a movie.

Quester's Theatre (49 La Plante)—The Blood is Strong.

Theatre in the Delt—From A to B With Dorothy Parker — thru Sat. 9:30.

Ceach House (University Alumnae)—The Double Dealer — Congreve's bawdy comedy continues thru Sat.

La Conference D'Ottawa: vive deception

par MICHEL BEAULIEU

(Following is a reaction from French Canada on the recent Federal-Provincial Conference. Michel Beaulieu is the co-editor of the University of Montreal student newspaper Le Quartier Latin. He was recently in Toronto for the Carabin weekend.)

La récente conférence fédérale-provinciale a jeté un vent de déception sur la province de Québec.

Il semblerait à ce point évident que le premier ministre Lesage allait être à la hauteur de son ultimatum que nous nous attendions à tout le moins à des concessions plus importantes de la part du gouvernement fédéral.

Le gouvernement du Québec exigeait d'abord, puis demandait simplement par la suite le retour à la province des impôts dans l'ordre 25-25-100. Ils n'ont obtenue que 9-17-50.

L'on sait par ailleurs que les impôts sur les successions reviennent de droit aux provinces et qu'ils ont été concédés à Ottawa durant la guerre de 1939. Or, ils n'en sont jamais tout à fait revenus.

La première erreur de M. Lesage aura sans doute été de céder sur le mot ultimatum. S'y fut-il tenu qu'il aurait sans doute obtenu plus encore qu'il n'a obtenu. L'on sait qu'une première défaillance laisse toujours entrevoir les suivantes.

Les réactions sont diverses devant l'échec des revendications fiscales. D'aucuns prétendent que M. Lesage a simplement reculé; d'autres qu'il a trahi les espoirs du Québec; d'autres qu'il devra augmenter la taxation et imposer un nouvel équilibre; d'autres enfin, qu'il obtiendra satisfaction lors de la prochaine conférence fédérale-provinciale.

On se plait aussi à dire dans certains milieux que M. Pearson a simplement été plus fin politique que M. Lesage.

La réaction qui semble malgré tout la plus sensée est celle du R.I.N. (Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance du Québec) qui reproche à M. Lesage d'avoir succombé à la loi facile du compromis. Il ne faut pas perdre de vue non plus les intérêts politiques du premier ministre d'un parti qui a refusé lors de son dernier congrès de rompre avec la section fédérale. Or, M. Lesage avait accordé son appui aux Libéraux d'Ottawa lors des élections d'avril dernier; il ne pouvait que difficilement imposer ses revendications sous forme d'ultimatum aux membres d'un même parti. Membres avec qui il a d'ailleurs déjà siégé avant de venir au fédéral.

D'autre part, M. Lesage sait que devant les mesures prises par Ottawa à son endroit il devra de toute manière trouver les argentés qui lui manquent pour réaliser le programme qu'il s'est engagé à réaliser. La seule solution à ce point, pour rétablir un équilibre qui est actuellement assez précoce, sera sans doute d'établir la double taxation.

Il s'agira ensuite de savoir dans quelle mesure Ottawa pourra parer à une telle éventualité, et dans quelle mesure le peuple Québécois comprendra la portée d'une telle mesure.

Translation

The recent Federal-Provincial conference has blown a wind of deception at Quebec.

It seems that Prime Minister Lesage was going to rise to the occasion of his ultimatum that we were anticipating at least some of the more important concessions on the part of the federal government.

The government of Quebec insisted at first, and then simply asked later on, for a return to the province of the taxes given them by the order 25-25-100. They only got 9-17-50.

One knows besides, that succession taxes are given by law to the provinces and that they were conceded to Ottawa during the Second World War. They have never been completely returned.

The first error of Mr. Lesage was, without doubt, to give up on the word ultimatum. If he had stuck to it, he would have obtained more than he did. One knows that a moment of weakness always gives us a glimpse of what is to follow.

The reactions have been diverse to the failure of the fiscal claims. Some pretend that Mr. Lesage has simply retreated; others that he has betrayed the hopes of Quebec; others that he will have to increase taxation in order to impose a new balance; and others that he will gain satisfaction at the time of the next Federal-Provincial conference.

Also, one is pleased to say in certain circles that Mr. Pearson has simply been more political than Mr. Lesage.

The reaction that appears the most sensible of all, is that of the R.I.N. (Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance du Québec) which reproaches Mr. Lesage for having succumbed to the easy law of compromise. Nor should one loose from sight the political interests of the Premier of a party who refused at the time of the last party congress to break with the federal section. Mr. Lesage gave his support to the Federal Liberal Party in the elections of last April. It is only with difficulty then that he can impose his claims under the form of an ultimatum to members of the same party, members with whom he has already sat, before coming to the federal conference.

On the other hand, Mr. Lesage knows that faced with the measures taken by Ottawa he must find the money that is missing to him in order to realize the program that he has undertaken. The only solution at this point, for reestablishing a balance which is actually very delicate, will surely be to establish a system of double taxation. It is finally a question of knowing in what measure Ottawa will be able to provide for such an eventuality, and in what measure the people of Quebec will understand the import of such a measure.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Irish win boxla opener, 10-8

By AL SCHOENBORN

Favored St. Mike's A has taken a one-game lead in the best-of-three final lacrosse series for the Dafoe Trophy after a convincing 10-8 victory over PHE A yesterday.

The Double Blue spotted PHE an early 3-0 second-period edge before roaring back to take a 4-3 half-time lead. The defending champions added five more in the third quarter to go ahead 9-5 and then cut short a PHE comeback attempt to win by a two-goal margin.

George Olah and Vern McCreary each hit for four goals for St. Mike's while Barry Fleming added the other two.

Don Arthurs was high man in the goal scoring department for PHE with five counters. Jim McElroy scored a pair of goals for the losers while Larry Nancekivell added the other.

The goalkeeping of St. Mike's Larry Soden was probably the main factor in the win as he consistently made dazzling saves to break the hearts of the Phys Ed attackers.

The loss leaves PHE with its back to the wall.

The Double Blue from St. Mike's need only a win in the next game on Tuesday at 1 p.m. to successfully defend their title and the Dafoe Trophy.

PHE is faced with problems but is definitely not out of it. Even with such a poor day as PHE had yesterday, St. Mike's could only produce a two-goal margin which came at least partly on mediocre goals. A little more organization in the Phys Ed attack should produce a real thriller Tuesday.

HOCKEY

UC I's amazing Redmen yesterday kept their bubble intact as they skated to a 3-2 win over previously unbeaten Vic I. The win moved UC into a tie for top spot in Group I.

Nelson Neff and Jody Curran shot UC into a 2-0 first-half lead before Vic came back in the second half to knot the score on goals by Rick Elliott and Les Foreman. Phil Kosoy counted the winner for Redmen with less than five minutes remaining in the game.

Sr. SPS handed the hard-luck PHE I squad its third straight setback with a narrow 2-1 win in a goalkeepers' battle. It was Skule's first win.

Skule goals came from Gord Fraser and Jim Smith while Pete Burwash hit for the lone PHE goal.

In Group II action, Meds A edged St. Mike's B 2-1.

Pharmacy A trounced Trinity B 8-1 in Group III while undefeated Law moved into a four-point lead in Group IV as it crushed Wycliffe 7-0 while Knox won its initial game by a 3-2 margin over Forestry.

Intermediate action saw three shutouts as Vic V took Trinity C 1-0, St. Mike's E made it 2-0 over Vic VII, and Vic VI beat SPS VI 3-0. Fourth contest resulted in a 6-5 win for UC IV over Vic VIII.

Fencers at Rochester

Varsity Fencing Blues invade western New York State for a dual meet with Rochester Institute of Technology Saturday. Rochester has always been one of Blues' toughest exhibition rivals, and Varsity has been unable to defeat Rochester on their home ground for the last two years.

The six fencers wearing Toronto colors tomorrow are Helmut Microys, Nansung Ho, Martin Moskovits, Peter Urban, Vladimir Hattschinski, and Tony Advocaat.

The second match of the home-and-home exhibition series with Rochester is slated for January. Next weekend Blues entertain Hobart College at Hart House.

um with a 58-32 win over Sr. SPS. Skule's Reg Eadie was high scorer in the game with 15 points.

Vic I edged Pharmacy A 45-41 led by Chuck Homer with 13 and Ivan Ringle with nine points. Keith Flexman was high man for the drug-gists with 14 points while Bill Sexsmith added 10.

A pair of lowscoring encounters saw Jr. SPS take UC II, 23-15, and Meds B de feat Architecture, 29-19.

Campbell and Chapelle steal show

Although Physical and Health Education won the interfaculty swim meet at Hart House last night, it was two freshmen who stole the spotlight.

Robin Campbell, a first-year student at New College, accounted for all New's 18 points in the team standings by winning three events, the 400 and 200-yard free-styles and the 100-yard butterfly.

Campbell won his three events easily. He took the 400-yard free by more than 12 seconds and the butterfly by just under 12 seconds. His margin in the 200-yard free was 2.8 seconds.

Mike Chapelle, younger brother of former Varsity swim star Mary Chapelle, led SPS to a third-place finish by winning the 100-yard breast-stroke and the 200-yard individual medley. Chapelle took his events handily as well, winning the medley by 28.3 seconds and the breast-stroke by 15 seconds.

PHE's point-winning total was 61, followed by Vic with 45 and UC with 32 points.

PHE set the only record of the meet in the 200-yard medley relay. The team of John Russell, Bob Smagala, Lyn Kelsey and Arne Pfeiff was clocked in 2:01.7, seven-tenths of a second below the former record.

Team Standings — PHE (61), Victoria (45), University College (32), SPS (28), New College (18) Architecture (6), Medicine (2)

100-yard freestyle — Mulliken (Arch), Richardson (UC), Rhodes (PHE). Time: 1:01.5.

100-yard breast-stroke — Chapelle (SPS), Vanderberg (PHE), Clark (UC). Time: 1:07.0.

100-yard butterfly — Campbell (New), Kelsey (PHE), Clark (Vic). Time: 1:03.6.

50-yard freestyle — Richardson (UC), MacRae (Vic), Sears (Vic). Time: 26.9.

400-yard freestyle — Campbell (New), Meronen (UC), Muranyi (PHE). Time: 4:53.8.

100-yard back-stroke — Walker (Vic), Russell (PHE), Lilly (PHE). Time: 1:05.5.

200-yard individual medley — Chapelle (SPS), Geale (Vic), McCreath (UC). Time: 2:27.4.

200-yard freestyle — Campbell (New), Mekonen (UC), Wilson (PHE). Time: 2:13.8.

200-yard sprint relay — PHE, Vic, UC. Time: 1:48.0.

Diving — White (PHE), Fox (SPS), Wheeler (Vic). Points: 167.05.

Varsity swimmers hold intrasquad meet at HH

By SHEL KRAKOWSKY

Varsity's swim team tunes up for the intercollegiate season with an intrasquad meet tonight at Hart House pool at 5 p.m.

The teams competing will consist of one squad of veteran swimmers and one squad of rookies.

At first glance it would seem the rookies don't have a chance against their older brethren. But the neophytes are strong in numbers and ability and stand a good chance of winning.

Headlining the freshman contingent are Kal Schneider, Mike Chapelle, Rob Campbell, Stan Walker and Jim Parker.

The greybeards will be joined by coach John Ridpath in an effort to subdue the young hopefuls. Ridpath is a former intercollegiate backstroke champion and at one time held the Canadian record for the 200-yard backstroke.

Former Varsity swimmer Larry Bell may also don the trunks for the veterans.

The Varsity team is still without a diving partner for Bob Smagala and unless some competition can be found for Smagala before tonight, the diving will have to be dropped from the intrasquad meet program.

FIRST ATHLETIC NIGHT OF SEASON

Cage Blues open against McGill after win over Waterloo Lutheran

By PAUL HENDERSON

Tomorrow night marks the 1963-64 revival of one of the most popular traditions on the U of T campus.

The event—The First Athletic Night of the year. The time and place—6:30 p.m. at Hart House.

The feature attraction of the evening will be Varsity Basketball Blues' initial OQAA game of the season. McGill Redmen are the opponents for the 8:30 contest, which will be followed by a dance.

In a preliminary interfac match, St. Michael's and PHE tangle at 6:30 p.m.

Blues completed their preparatory exhibition grind in top form Wednesday with a convincing 98-51 victory over Waterloo Lutheran University at Waterloo.

Captain Dave West led Blues with 25 points on eight field-goals and nine free throws.

West's scoring typified Blues' vast improvement in shooting over that in the game against Syracuse. The players hit on 53 per cent of their attempts at Waterloo but on only 17 per cent at Syracuse.

Also conforming to this trend to accuracy were Ed Bordas (16 points), Nolan Kane (14), Bill Woloshyn (12), and Arvo Neidre (10).

Blues will indubitably encounter much stronger opposition, however, when they meet Redmen tomorrow.

Co-captains Steve Chandler and Jack Walker head the impressive list of five returning McGill lettermen. Centre Chandler, an American, took 12th spot in OQAA scoring last season with an 11.8-point average.

Walker is Redmen's main play-maker and sparks the McGill attack. From his guard position in 1962-63, he netted 134 points for a 16.8 point-average which earned him fourth place in league statistics.

One other returnee is of note, Marty Wright, who averaged 9.1 points last season.

Redmen have strengthened their roster with the addition of 6'5" George Lengvari and 6'3" Dave Gyllman. Lengvari toiled for Loyola last year where he won team scoring honors and the MVP award.

Bruce Randle, a former Toronto high school star, is a promising rookie.

McGill coach Ron Sharp believes he has "the best team in several years" and that Redmen "may be the dark horses in the run for the championship."

Varsity mentor John McManus, pleased with the team's effort at Waterloo, rates his group highly and indicates it will concede nothing to Redmen.

WE MUST NOT FORESAKE SPORT'S TRUE PURPOSE

Alexander Pope once said "True disputants are like true sportsmen; their whole delight is in the pursuit."

To pursue a sport is to enjoy all its various faces, whether it be the practices or the competitions, the failures or the successes, the frustrations or the advancements, the pleasures or the disappointments.

The true sportsman is unconcerned with whether he wins or loses; the importance lies in how he performs whether as an individual or on a team.

Why should we laugh or scorn at this ideal?

Why shouldn't more educators stress this philosophy in their teaching so that the future generation will not know the meaning of the phrase "poor sportsmanship"?

And why should athletic scholarships have unhealthy connotations in our country?

Our society has become degeneratively professionalistic. No one plays a game just for the sake of playing it or for the pure enjoyment involved.

We have been taught to win; and win we shall or our cheeks shall blush and our heads shall hang low.

This concept of professionalism is ruining our sports. Is it possible for pro football players to enjoy their game when they know that their livelihood might depend on whether they catch the touchdown pass or not or whether they are rough enough to disable an opponent or not?

This is not sport—this is a three-ring circus of sports spectacles from pro football all the way down to figure skating. The university is the last true fortress of hope. The women especially have taken steps in the right direction.

In interfaculty sports, points are awarded not only for winning but for participation as well. A small college or faculty might have a poor chance of winning and yet might have 100% participation.

In a different approach, intercollegiate tournaments have several social functions and gatherings at each competition. The Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Union introduced this to avoid the professional aspects of sport.

We are not automats, which if money is placed in the slot, the desired product or result will emerge.

We are all supposedly individuals. We have our own ideals, our own objectives, and our own responsibilities; but we mustn't forsake the true purpose of sport for the sake of a sugar-coated, bitter-on-the-inside type of society.

MONTEITH & McNEIL JOIN HOCKEY BLUES FOR OPENERS

Five rookies crack starting lineup

By GORD BELLMORE

Five rookies have cracked Hockey Blues' starting line up for the league opener to night at McGill. Blues move to Kingston tomorrow to meet Queen's Golden Gaels in their only other league contest before the New Year.

The newcomers are centres Bobby McClelland and Hank Monteith, wingers Austin MacKay and Don Fuller, and defenceman Bob Hamilton. This talented group more than makes up for the few losses Blues suffered from last year's lineup.

Combined with a solid core of veterans and the return of all-star defenceman Ian Sinclair, the rookies should give Blues the depth and balance they lacked last season. Although Blues dominated the all-star team and league scoring in 1962-63, they had certain fatal weaknesses which cost them first place in the Eastern Division.

Blues' undefeated record in the pre-season series this year suggests things will be different this season.

For the games this weekend, coach Joe Kane intends to use Hank Monteith and Fuller, who has been especially impressive so far, on a line with steady veteran George Olah.

Reunited for the first time this season will be last year's high-scoring "Mop Line" of Ward Passi, Steve Monteith and Sonny Osborne. This will be Monteith's first game of the season since he recovered from an ankle injury suffered playing football.

Monteith, Passi and Osborne finished 1-2-3 in that order in the Eastern Division scoring race last season.

The third Varsity line will consist of Bryan Tompson, McClelland, and Bob Awrey. Awrey returns to the wing spot for the first time in two seasons because all-star Stu McNeil is making the trip as a defenceman.

MacKay will be the spare forward and will probably see action if Monteith's weak ankle fails to hold up under its first serious test.

Blues will be anchored by the league's best defence, Sinclair, McNeil, Hamilton and Peter Speyer.

Watertreaders backed against wall for final title game with Redmen

The once-cocky Varsity Waterpolo Blues have a mere 20 minutes of stop time to prove they really are the best watertreading seven in the OQAA when they play host to McGill Redmen Saturday night at Hart House.

The only way Blues can reassert their supremacy and continue their hold on the Herschorn Cup, is to whip Redmen by more than eight goals.

Varsity travelled to Montreal two weeks ago on the crest of laudatory press clippings, and the first game of the two-game total-point series with McGill was considered a mere formality. For after all, Blues had embarrassed Redmen 4-3-4 in the 1962 series, and this year's squad was considered even stronger than last year's champions.

Blues were so confident in STRAY SHOTS: Sonny Osborne is Blues' team captain this season with Bob Awrey and Ian Sinclair the assistants . . . Chris Speyer and rookie Jerry Marlborough were left home this weekend for Blues to meet the player limit . . . Blues' only remaining casualty, Butch McGee, will wear his leg cast for about another week, much to his chagrin . . . Blues don't play another league game until the New Year but will visit Michigan for two games next weekend and play in the big Christmas tournament at Boston against some of the best U.S. college teams.

With the addition of sometime-footballer Tom Verth to the line-up, Blues should be considerably stronger. Verth was a member of last year's undefeated team, and is probably Canada's best free-swimmer.

Blues will foist veteran Larry Bell on Kees Klerks, the McGill sensation who potted seven goals against Varsity two weeks ago.

Under the Water: Other members of Blues' starting lineup are George Watkins, Tom Muranyi, Bill Piggett, Don Wheeler, and goaltender John Harper. Game time is 8 p.m.

Pearson says students more politically aware today criticizes excessive press coverage of extremists

Students today are much more politically aware than they were in his undergraduate days, Prime Minister Lester Pearson told a Convocation Hall audience of Victoria University graduates and students Friday night.

Fifty years ago no prime minister would have been asked to receive a delegation from NFCS about RCMP activities on campuses in connection with Communist subversive activities.

"The RCMP were Mounties then, riding the Western plains and Northern wastes; communism was merely some academic foreign doctrine and subversion must have had something to do with the Soph-Frosh Scrap or knocking down the goal posts after a rugby, not a football, game".

Mr. Pearson, a Vic graduate of IT7, was the featured speaker at ceremonies marking the 50th anniversary of the opening of Victoria University's Burwash Hall and North, Middle, Gate and South Houses of the men's residences.

In 1913, he recalled, "God was in his heaven and all was right with our world."

"It was inconceivable that I should have been a member of a delegation interviewing a cabinet minister with the request that student's summer earnings should be exempt from income tax. There was no income tax then."

It had taken the First World War, he said, to awaken students to the realities of Canada's national and international relationships.

Noting a difference today, he described the "intense concern among younger people with our country, its governments and their policies and problems."

"Political clubs flourish on campuses and parliamentary elections arouse great and high spirited interest", he stated, although he either did not know of or choose to mention the Liberal Party's victory in the Model Parliament elections earlier in the

He decried "excessive publicity being given to the views and actions of those who would weaken it (Canada) as a nation."

"A student attack on a statue of General Wolfe gets a front page notice or full television coverage, but an elegant appeal by the Governor-General for all Canadians to remember and take pride in the things that bind us together as Canadians goes almost unnoticed."

He asked for avoidance of extremism on either side—separatism in Quebec and reaction in other parts of Canada.

"The provinces must have their jurisdictions fully respected — especially Quebec which is not in so many ways a province like the others," Mr. Pearson said. He called for constructive co-operation between the federal government and the provinces.

Liberals win squeaker from NDP Turnout down 1,768 from last year

University of Toronto Liberals won their fourth consecutive Model Parliament victory Friday by a narrow margin of 64 votes.

In the closest election on record Liberals took 1,038 of a total 3,017 votes, followed by the New Democrats with 974 and the Progressive Conservatives with 939. Spoiled ballots beat Communists 195 to 68.

The new system of vote allotment making number of seats per party proportional unless one party takes 40 per cent or more of the vote gave Liberals 37 seats, NDP 35, PCs 33 and Communists two. Formerly the winning party took 50 of the 97 seats, the remainder being divided proportionally among the other parties.

The final tally of results was known within 90 minutes of the 3 p.m. poll-closing time. The final returns from Sigmund Samuel Library, were indicative of the voting trend. The Liberals took 101, the NDP 99, the Conservatives 36 and the Communists five.

The popular vote of 3,017 was 1,768 short of last year's record 4,785 turnout.

A major upset came from St. Michael's College, where the PCs took a 108-vote majority over the Liberals, perennial winners at SMC. St. Michael's, which recorded the heaviest vote, and Medicine both gave the PCs a majority.

Prime Minister Ivan McFarlane failed to carry Trinity, where he is a fourth-year student. He was edged out by a 128 vote for Mary Brewin, also at Trinity. The Liberals polled 118, the PCs 80, the Communists 1.

Trinity also recorded 48 rejected ballots, the most from any college or school. The ballots were cast for either the Anti-Model Parliament Party or the Progressive Free-Soil Party, rebel groups formed out of protest to last week's slack campaign.

Of the two parties, the Free Soilers took the majority of the rejected votes, said Model Parliament election director Ian Thompson (OCE).

Thompson criticised the coverage given the campaign by The Varsity, calling the news reports of the debates "lacklustre" and Wednesday's platform centre-spread unfair to the parties.

In his victory speech, Liberal Club President Mike Levine (III UC) praised students who voted despite what he called "many foul odors during the past two weeks, especially those coming from the Varsity office."

"It's hard to come so close and not win," said Mary Brewin, NDP parliamentary leader. "But we have greatly improved our organization, and we've got lots of new people working for us. And we got a much better per cent of the vote than we did in the past few years."

"In the parliament we hope to provide a good constructive opposition, and keep the debate on a high level," she added.

PC Rick Tan made the same criticism of the turnout he made last year. "There was a very low turnout in the areas where we campaigned most," he said.

Says RCMP surveillance checks freedom of speech

RCMP surveillance on university campuses has been called a checking influence to freedom of speech and thought, David Jenkins, the Canadian Union of Students' National President, said that.

RCMP investigations on university campuses will be discussed on the television show Front Page Challenge tomorrow at 9:30 p.m. Jenkins will present the stand of the Canadian Union of Students.

"Professors and students are afraid to think and challenge ideas if they feel they are under constant watch by the RCMP," said Jenkins.

He said that both Prime Minister Pearson and RCMP Commissioner McClellan had assured him that there is no general RCMP surveillance on the campuses. "But students are watching closely across Canada," Jenkins said, "to see if the RCMP breaches this policy."

"There can be no objection to RCMP officers studying at universities, as it is a good idea to bring up the standards of the RCMP."

Varsity to print literary issue

The Varsity's final issue of the term, containing largely poetry and short stories by U of T students, will appear this Friday.

P. O. Maude, the literary issue's editor, said he is impressed with much of the material submitted by students.

"I'm glad to see that students here can still write," he said last night, "and it's fortunate this issue is being published to replace the old literary magazine Jargon that the Students' Administrative Council cancelled last year."

The bumper Friday Varsity is expected to "sell out" quickly and students are asked not to hoard copies.

It was erroneously reported in Friday's Varsity that there will be no admission charge for the Hungarian String Quartet concert to be held Thursday in the Edward Johnson Building. There will be an admission charge for this concert.

Form non-violence committee at U of T

There will be an organizational meeting of the University of Toronto Non-violence Committee today at 5 p.m. in Hart House south sitting room.

The newest campus committee resulted from a meeting last week of student representatives from several campus clubs and governments. Students' Administrative Council President Doug Ward (III Emm) and Tom Wakayama, representative of Students' Non-violent Coordinating Committee, conducted the forum.

Wakayama sought primarily to form a fund-raising U of T branch of Friends of SNCC, supporters of the current civil rights movement in the U.S.A.

The Toronto students, however, felt there was a definite need for local action by students in the cause of social order. Youth work among Regent Park area residents and action to curb alleged police brutality were examples cited.

The forum consequently decided to take a double approach to the non-violent movement. Ward agreed that the local situation would be given first attention, while the American integration movement would also be assisted financially by the Toronto committee.

CUP COMMENT

By BRUCE KIDD

The campus Liberals can take satisfaction their victory Friday was just one of several Model Parliament election wins by Liberals at Canadian universities in recent weeks. Their brethren at Queen's, Western, the University of Manitoba, and the University of Saskatchewan have all formed governments at their respective universities.

But ardent Liberals who picture these victories as indicative of a cross-nation trend towards the Pearson government should be sufficiently sobered by the fact most of the other elections duplicated the uninspiring campaign witnessed here.

Discounting traditional Grit stronghold Queen's, Liberal victories were all incisive and where the rules allowed, minority governments were formed. At Western the winners captured only 24 of 60 seats; at Manitoba the Grits took 29 seats out of a possible 57; while at Saskatchewan, the Liberals commanded but 19 seats in a House of 45.

The apathy which pervaded the Toronto campaign and the subsequent spotty turnout at the polls was reflected elsewhere, as was the trend towards non-standard parties.

Counterpart to the ballot-spoiling, platformless Anti-Model Parliament Party on this campus is the Nihilist Party at Western. Both can be dismissed as mere muckraking groups.

The other association which wrote-in ballots Friday, the agrarian radical group styled the Progressive-Free Soilers, is not strictly an abolitionist party, and according to its standard-bearer Essex Ribald (IV UC) would have run as an official party if this year's rules had permitted. Condemned to a state of limbo, the Free-Soilers facetiously campaigned on such traditional losing causes as the repeal of the tariff on binder-twine, the restoration of wheat trading on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and Carthago Delenda Est.

But out west, where most of the Free-Soilers' interest lies, a non-federal type party has had some success. Campaigning on a program of model parliament re-organization, the Campus Reform Independent party otherwise known as CRIP, polled eight per cent of the total vote and captured five of 45 seats. During the campaign, CRIP argued the influence of parent parties should be removed "so questions of a political nature could be discussed freely, unencumbered by commitments to existing parties."

At least one old-line party was scandalized by CRIP. The honest, upstanding, forthright, serious Conservatives charged that "CRIP is a joker party, completely negative in its approach . . . and will make a farce of Model Parliament." According to the Conservatives, the objective of Model Parliament was to provide "a realistic situation with real issues."

All very serious. But come the election, it was the Tories, not CRIP, who were guilty of stuffing the ballot boxes with 140 illegal ballots.

SUB FLOATS AT UBC

Not the RCMP, not French Canada, but a proposed student-financed student union at the University of British Columbia has taken most of the ink in the student press this fall. Hardly an issue of The Ubysses has been published without a banner headline, or at least the lead story concerning the envisaged undergraduate haven, the $3.1 million price of which will cost the student body $2.9 million.

This fall an extra $5 was added to student fees to start payments for yet-to-be constructed S.U.B. But when the UBC student council decided to raise student fees an additional five to pay off S.U.B. 15 years sooner, it also raised many vociferous protests. And these were not only directed at the increased levy, but at S.U.B.'s very existence.

The Ubysses became the forum for the loud and long debate, and usually letters denouncing the scheme were printed juxtaposed with pro-S.U.B. advertisements sponsored by council. Several meetings were staged to voice opinion about the proposed S.U.B., and on one occasion a downtown lawyer was hired to handle the anticipated violent debate.

At length the whole matter was submitted to a plebiscite.
While a record turnout of 7,187 (75 per cent of eligible voters) re-endorsed the building, the required 66 per cent needed to OK the additional fee increase was not obtained. But with the renewed affirmation for S.U.B., construction of the building will be started next spring. The only remaining snag is the administration's insistence S.U.B. be paid off in 15 years. At present, the only way students can accomplish this is to raise the fees by $5. Unless a sugar daddy can be found.

WAR ATROCITIES REVISITED

Author Jack Ludwig, recent guest lecturer at the University of Toronto, was an undergraduate beite noire at the University of Manitoba, the Manitoban recently recounted. Ludwig incurred almost universal censure in 1944, when he published the poem "Atrocities" in an undergraduate literary magazine.
Here is a portion of the poem:

"The fault of war
Is that it kills the wrong people.
If only the tortures inflicted upon these men
Were inflicted upon those at the home front
It would all be a matter of rejoicing: especially Upon all the members of the government,
The big-time politician and the local home-front patriot.
All those who again and again,
So willingly proclaim their determination
To die for democracy, knowing full well,
They will be never be called upon to do so."

Mr. Ludwig is also the author of the novel Confusions.

vote. He added that absence of "political big wheels brought in by the parties" made the parties concentrate on issues and consequently lose student interest.

"If anyone should have won, it was the NDP," he said. "They worked the hardest. The Liberals captured the vote of most students who voted without reading the

"We got about the same per cent of the vote as we did last year."

He attributed the drop in support for the Liberals and PCs to poor campaigns.

"Also," he said, "the NDP ran a very good campaign this year. It's always the best, but this year it was even better."

He added that the novelty party platforms or thinking."

Tan said the PCs would take a co-operative attitude in January's parliament. "If the parliament doesn't go well, it may be the last one we ever have," he said.

Communist leader Tim Walsh said the result was about what he had expected.

of a girl parliamentary leader had almost tempted him to vote NDP.

The new prime minister, Ivan McFarlane, was not available for comment last night. Details of his selection of cabinet ministers will be published when received by The Varsity.

Vote dooms Free-Soil Party

The Model Parliament election has come and gone, the spontaneously-formed Progressive Free-Soil Party with it.

For those students who didn't get a chance to see the Soilers' platform because of the white heat of last week's apathy, part of the Soilers' program is printed here.

In a pamphlet headed 'Why waste your vote? SPOIL YOUR BALLOT!', the rebel party urged students to write in "Progressive Free-Soil" on their ballot.

Besides "Non-recognition of Model Parliament, now or ever," the platform included: Silver at 16 to 1, liberation of St. Pierre and Miquelon, repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and bounty of $75 on all slaveholders, and adoption of the musk-ox as a symbol for Canadian National flag.

Among the non-qualified proposals were an end to mothers' allowances, recall of deputies, dissemination of birth control (sic) and Carthago Delenda Est.

The broadsheet was endorsed by "Essex Ribald," parliamentary leader.

Announce major expansion programs

Major expansion plans for two Ontario universities were announced last week.

Construction will start immediately on a 15-storey men's residence building at the University of Ottawa, while University of Windsor plans to launch a $23,000,000 development program next spring.

First buildings to go up at Windsor will be a $3,590,000 physics and chemistry building, and a $2,000,000 administration building.

The project for 1965 was a $1,500,000 biology building. A fine arts complex, a graduate studies centre and a nursing education building in 1966 would cost another $6,000,000.

A humanities centre, athletic building and residence would complete the project.

University Governor John

J. Stuart, who announced the plans for expansion, estimated Windsor will have to accommodate 5,000 students by 1970. The present full-time enrolment of 1,816 is triple the 1956 figure of the former Assumption University.

Mr. Stuart said the provincial and federal governments would bear the brunt of the costs, while Basilian Fathers, former Assumption administrators, will contribute more than $2,000,000 for residences.

Public and alumni will be approached for an additional $3,500,000.

The University of Windsor has just completed a seven-year building program which involved more than $15,000,000 in capital expenditures

moderate action

Prime Minister Lester Pearson, speaking at Victoria College Friday night, warned that Canada could be "destroyed" by a combination of extremism and indifference.

"There are forces that would disunite our country," Mr. Pearson said. "In Quebec they are called separatists. In other parts of Canada they are old-fashioned reactionaries who think in terms of Anglo-Saxon uniformity and ascendancy."

The prime minister went on to say that such extremism can only be stopped if the reasonable Canadians avoid an attitude of indifference and silence.

The same ideas, and more, were expounded by Doug Ward when he spoke to students two days before the march on Queen's Park.

Ward said the silence of the moderates was giving strength to extremist views, and urged students of the "radical middle" to make their presence known.

Writing in the Nov. 11 issue of The Varsity, Ward decried "our greatest sin, passivism." He described passivism as the stance of indifference which allows events to follow a path which eventually leads to disaster.

Like most moderates, both the prime minister and Ward were attacking the extremists who tend to shove the country and the world toward the brink of destruction.

But neither of these men stopped after criticizing the extremists. They both went on to stress the need for action on the part of the moderates.

"But difficulties — especially to younger Canadians — are only an incentive to action; obstacles are only something to be removed," Mr. Pearson concluded.

Today the moderates find themselves in the position of having to act. But many of them are afraid to act because they fear that action is a move to an extremist position.

The march on Queen's Park has pointed out the fallacy of this fear. It demonstrated that reasonable persons acting in a reasonable manner can act without becoming extremists.

Just as a man can act calmly and reasonably to stop a fight, so can the moderate man act to help overcome the extremist views which continually jockey for power and eventually push our society to the point of crisis.

But the mere knowledge that one is a moderate, and the knowledge that one can act is not enough to prevent the extremist views from predominating.

The moderates must act — and their actions must be positive demonstrations of the reasonable methods needed to remedy the conditions over which the extremists disagree.

The future welfare of this country lies in the hands of the moderates, but unless those hands are raised from their passive posture and placed at the service of reasonable action, the future may not hold much promise.

a deep concern

In answer to Opposition criticism Friday night Defence Minister Paul Hellyer told the House of Commons that despite drastic cuts in the size of the Canadian militia, the militia will still be strong enough to handle its national role in the event of nuclear attack.

It is gratifying to learn that, although the Liberal government is willing to involve us in a nuclear holocaust, it has a genuine concern for the few of us who would survive.

On campus...

By J. D. S-L-NG-R

I know you couldn't really give a damn or anything, but my name is Ackley Prince, if you want to know.

So I'm a fantastically intelligent and sensitive student at this real phoney university. I mean, this place is so full of phoney guys that it really makes me want to puke and everything, and I'm not kidding.

I don't know why I'm telling you all this, for crissake, since I'm almost the biggest liar in the world and my real name is Golden Haulfield and frankly, I'm a real goddamn maniac. I'm just the maddest guy around. I even lied about going to this university. Frankly, I don't go there anymore because they made me quit on account of this damn cancer I got in my jaw. Boy, it really kills me. (Christ, there I go again, I just can't stop lying, I swear to God!)

So anyway, I used to go there until the place made me so damn sick that I just had to pack up my sister Peony's ju-jubes and leave, or else they would have had to take me away in a damn truck, for crissake. I'm shackled up in this real cornball hotel where they won't even serve a guy a little shot; it really gives me a pain. Since I don't even make out with any of the dames in this cornball joint either I guess the only thing to do is sit down and tell you about some of the stuff I absolutely hated about university. It's one way of passing the goddamn time.

Well, to begin with, I'll just give you a mild example of the kind of phoney bastards you find at that place. One time I was in the stacks of this giant library they have down there. I mean it's so big that you can get lost, and I'm not kidding. It's the worst goddamn disorganized place you ever saw.

So here I was, looking for this book that wasn't even mentioned in any of the cruddy catalogues or anywhere, when this really impolite studious-looking bastard walked up behind me. He was really crude and had a face covered with this really bad acne and looked real intellectual and everything.

Intellectual my ass. He pretended to drop his book (it was so obvious), and, instead of reaching for the book, he bent down beside me and put his hands inside my blouse and everything. I almost had a hemorrhage; I got the hell out of there fast, I wanna tell you. I mean I go absolutely mad when anybody tries any real perverted stuff or anything. And he was such an intellectual-looking bastard too. A real phoney.

Another thing that really bugged hell out of me were these people that worked in the offices on the campus all over the place. I mean, they were such sincere bastards and everything, and all the while they couldn't really give a damn about what happened to you, for crissake. I you were ever in trouble, or hard up for money or needed a parking space, they would ask you all these really sincere sympathetic questions and everything not because they were at all interested, but mainly because they were being paid for just sitting there and picking their noses and acting like real phoney bureaucratic bastards. They were just working off a goddamn guilt complex by being so damn sincere and everything and it used to give me royal pain just to watch them.

Then there are the phoney guys that join all these political clubs all over the place. You know, they walk around like they've already been elected Prime minister or something, talking about all this political crap in these real insouciant voices. You'd they said was. They're real even know it them, I really

academic freedom

The recent discussions in The Varsity and elsewhere about academic freedom, has surprisingly sparked some thought and discussion among students. I am not so sure that my thoughts add much to the issue but perhaps the relating of this personal incident will be relevant and fruitful.

Having suffered through three months of an insipid anthropology course of the "soup line variety" (cf Varsity Editorial, Oct. 30) and knowing the general dissatisfaction of many other students of the class, I stood up in class and protested. Many might disagree as to my method but that is unimportant in the light of the answer I received.

I admit the professor invited me to discuss the matter privately (was he afraid of a public debate?) but then he said, "You have no right whatsoever to tell me what to teach." No right at all?

Do we exist for the professors? Do we simply pay fees and take what comes?

Both professor and student share a mutual right to truth and we must give and take. He who claims the other side has no rights in the matter has sadly missed the purpose of education. If student government on this campus is looking for a purpose, here it is—protect the academic freedom of the students!

Daniel Knight (II SMC)

library cards

It appears from the account given in last Monday's issue of The Varsity that the proposed new library card will contain all the information at present on the ATL card. Is it then really necessary to duplicate in this manner?

Since the Sigmund Samuel Library is by far the greatest user of the ATL card, the introduction of the new library "charge-a-plate" will make this just another useless IBM card to be preserved and carried around campus.

In addition, various other University bodies, among them Residences and Hart House, issue pieces of paper to indicate differing status; for example, Record Room permits. It is surely possible to include the more commonly used cards on the library plate, which would then become the University I.D. card, without necessarily confusing the issue.

Such a consolidation would, if practicable, assist student and administration alike.

H. Banks (II APSC)

student action

Your editorial with respect to model parliaments raised the importance of direct student action. You mentioned, quite rightly, the activities of the Canadian-Canadian committee, but there are on campus several other groups concerned with worthwhile student action.

World University Service, Frontier College and the Canadian Universities Service Overseas are only three which could be mentioned. All are endeavouring to place the student in a position of responsibility, whereby he can both give assistance and learn from the experiences he has.

The reports and letters of volunteers in Asia, Africa and the West Indies demonstrate the capabilities of the Canadian student to act, and not just talk. Through a variety of jobs CUSO has established itself as a sound and worthwhile organization.

There is no place for mushy romanticism in CUSO, only hard work, and that is the best and most effective student action.

Charles Beer (IV UC)

So now you can see that I just had to leave this place because it just wasn't made for guys like me. I mean, all I really wanted was learning and some happiness while I was still young enough to enjoy both.

But there's no such damn thing at university as happiness, unless of course you fit right into the crowd of phoney bastards there. Before I went there I had this vague vision of all these students (I mean real students), real charming, sexy, smart bastards singing all these happy songs and real Heidelberg stuff and everything. Instead they're just a bunch of anemic guys going around thinking they're Joe College now, ready for the big-time. It's really sad as hell and everything. About the university, I mean. It's just a goddamned training ground for junior executives and their future wives and mistresses, for crissake. Isn't that really pathetic?

So anyway, I'm glad I got away from all these guys with the phoney fronts, all the do-gooders, the rah rah people, the big moofers, and just everybody there, because when it comes to the big college act, I mean, I just can't compete. So now you'll find me in Queen's Park every afternoon, counting my sister Peony's ju-jubes, all the red ones and blue ones and green ones, and watching how the leaves fall, trying to guess which one will go next.

It all seems, in a way, pointless and it's lonely sometimes, but heck, I'm almost happy.

in the process of seizing Syracuse by constructing a large wall which would seal off the peninsula. Thus surrounded by the Athenian fleet and land forces, Syracuse had begun to discuss surrender when Alcibiades arrived with Spartan reinforcements. The Syracusans forced a hasty retreat and intercepted the Athenian wall with one of their own. Nicias, his ships and kidneys rotting, aided by Demosthenes and a second armada made a last failing night attack. Driven back, he decided to sail home. At this point on the evening of August 27, 413 B.C., there occurred a total lunar eclipse.

The soothsayers recommended that Nicias wait until the next full moon before embarking. He waited. The entire Athenian fleet was captured and Nicias and Demosthenes put to death in what Thucydides calls "the greatest action in Greek history—the most calamitous of defeats."

T. E. Lawrence (of Arabia) writes in Seven Pillars of Wisdom: "Today was the fourth of July. Time pressed us, for we were hungry and Akaba was still far ahead behind two defences. . . Their cliff commanded the valley—a strong place which it might be costly to take. We assigned the honor to Ibn Jad and his unwearied men, advising him to try it after dark. By my diary there was an eclipse. Duly it came, and the Arabs forced the post without loss, while the superstitious soldiers were firing rifles and clanging copper pots to rescue the threatened satellite."

It was predicted that the world would end on Feb. 5, 1962 when a total solar eclipse occurred with the five visible planets within 16' of the eclipsed sun.

So we haven't really come that far—or have we?

Squash Blues split series with New England colleges

The travel-weary University of Toronto Squash team compiled a most respectable 2-2 record in a four-meet trip through New England on the weekend.

Blues downed Connecticut colleges Trinity and Wesleyan, both by identical 7-2 scores, while being outlasted by a pair of Massachusetts colleges, Amherst and Williams, by 3-6 and 2-7 counts respectively.

Blues performed as expected against the top-rated Amherst and Williams Colleges, but Coach Ralph Rimmer said his charges might have scored much better if these matches were at the start, not at the end, of the tour.

Blues played their strongest opponent, Williams, Saturday night, after two sleepless nights, three previous matches, and well over 1,000 automobile miles.

Outstanding Blue was Jim Rowland, who won all of his four matches. Wally Ross posted three wins against one loss, while Leighton McCarthy, Doug Tilley, Frank Buck, Don Matthews, and Paul Bugl each racquetted up 2-2 records.

Freshman Mike Gardiner and otherwise notorious Paul Wilson impressed in their first major tests, both winning two games against as many losses.

NANSUNG HO LEADS WITH FOUR WINS

Fencers outduel top rivals for first win at Rochester

ROCHESTER — University of Toronto fencing Blues scored a major triumph Saturday by outduelling Rochester Institute of Technology swordsmen, 17-10. The win marks the first time Blues have ever defeated their hosts on their own grounds.

Blues capitalized on the finesse of the foil team, which outclassed its opponents in all but one of nine bouts. Blues sabre-men took six of nine bouts, while the epee fencers could only manage three wins in nine contests. Most successful Blue was Nansung Ho, who scored four triumph against two losses. Other outstanding Blues were Helmut Microys and Peter Urban, both of whom compiled 3-3 records.

Foil specialist Tony Advokaat captured all three of his bouts, but he didn't duel in any other class. Marty Moskovits and Vladimir Haischinski tabulated 2-1 counts.

Blues next dual meet is Saturday against Hobart College at Hart House.

Varsity tops McGill crew, 99-56

By PAUL HENDERSON

Dave West and Ed Bordas of Varsity Basketball Blues were in excellent mid-season form for Blues' inaugural Senior Intercollegiate League game Saturday night.

The result — West and Bordas led the cagers to a convincing 99-56 victory over McGill Redmen before an approving Athletic Night crowd at Hart House.

West, an all-star guard and second-highest scorer in the league last season, netted 32 points on 14 field goals and four free throws. In addition to hitting on his familiar jump shot, West tipped in rebounds and set up his teammates on numerous occasions in a first-class display of basketball.

Bordas was a standout under the backboards. He also revealed an exceptionally good jump shot which netted most of his 22 points.

John O'Neill placed third in scoring for Blues, hitting for 15 points from long range.

Redmen were without the services of two lettermen, Sy Lutterman and their captain and top player Jack Walker, who missed the game through illness. Rookie Dave Gillman took charge in their absence and hooped 14 points before fouling out of the game in the fourth quarter.

Redmen were unable to penetrate the tight Toronto defence. They were particularly inept in the first half when they sank only nine field goals in 43 attempts.

Consequently, Blues were able to accumulate a formidable 50-26 half-time lead despite the fact that West was taken out of the game by coach John McManus at the 13-minute mark. West had 19 points at the time.

Redmen were most productive at the foul line, where they totalled 20 points on free throws. Blues picked up 13 tallies on foul shots but took 29 of the 48 personal fouls assessed by referees Harold Bocknek and Fred Nogas.

UNDER THE BASKET: Blues' hope to push their point total over the 100-mark vanished when Redmen took possession of the ball with six seconds remaining. . . . Ben Shore, McGill's second-highest scorer with 10 points, scored two of his points on an underhand "softball pitch. . . . Blues Jim Sheldon, Barry Anthony, Wayne Andrew and Mike Moore did not dress for the game as league rules limit rosters to 10 men for each game. . . . Windsor Lancers edged Aquinas College Tommies, 111-97, Saturday night in Grand Rapids, Mich., after Varsity centre Ed Bordas (55) hoops two of his 22 points in Blues' 99-56 win over McGill Saturday night at Hart House. Bordas played one of his best games ever as a Blue.

Redmen wrest Herschorn away from watertreaders

McGill University captured the Herschorn Trophy as intercollegiate water polo champions by edging Varsity, 10-8, at Hart House pool Saturday night. The victory gave McGill the two-game, total-goal series, 20-10, as Redmen had won the first game, 10-2, two weeks before at McGill.

Redmen had not won the Herschorn Trophy since 1959, Varsity having taking the title for the past three years. Prior to 1960, McGill had practically held a monopoly on the championship.

Blues managed to check McGill scoring star Kess Klerks and hold him to four goals. But Glen Ruiter took advantage of the interest in Klerks to score five times for the visitors. Marcel Lanchance counted the other McGill goal.

being upset, 73-71, earlier last week by Adrian College in Adrian, Mich. . . . Other exhibition games on the weekend saw St. Lawrence University defeat Queen's, 73-61, and Fredonia State take McMaster, 74-55. . . . The league schedule resumes after the New Year.

Blues (99) — West (32), Bordas (22), O'Neill (15), McKenzie (6), Neidre (3), Kane (5), Baranowicz (4), Ouchterlony (4), Woloshyn (4), Kimel (2).
McGill (56) — Gillman (14), Shore (10), Clarke (8), Chandler (6), Langvart (5), Rondal (5), Mingie (5), Wright (3).

Bill Pigott, with three goals, and Graeme Barber, with two, led Varsity scorers. Tom Verth, Don Wheeler and Tom Muranyi scored the other U of T goals.

McGill led throughout the game after scoring the first goal. At half time the score was 6-3 for Redmen. Blues outscored the visitors, 5-4, in the second half.

Tremblay, Paquet take early lead in hockey scoring

Marcellin Tremblay and Yvon Paquet of Laval Rouge et Or took an early lead in the intercollegiate hockey scoring race as Laval split two games on the weekend.

Tremblay and Paquet each have six points and Tremblay also leads in goals with five. Varsity's Don Fuller and Steve Monteith are second in goals with four apiece in two games.

Fuller and Monteith shine as puckmen win and tie

By GORD BELLMORE

Defending scoring champion Steve Monteith and rookie Don Fuller each scored four goals to pace Varsity Hockey Blues to a win and a tie in their first two league games of the season.

Blues managed a 4-4 with McGill Redmen Friday night in Montreal and then easily handled Queen's Golden Gaels, 6-0, in Kingston Saturday.

In other league openers, Laval Rouge et Or split their two-game western swing, losing to McMaster, 7-4, Friday night, and shellacking a weak Waterloo Warriors team, 9-1, Saturday.

The weekend action leaves Blues in first place in the infant season with three points, one more than McMaster and Laval.

At McGill, where Monteith scored three goals in his first game of the season, Blues jumped into a quick two-goal lead in the first period. They held this lead until the 15-minute mark of the middle period when centre Sonny Osborne was badly cut on his right eyelid and had to be taken to hospital where he received 11 stitches.

After this, Blues seemed to lose heart and McGill quickly made the score 2-1 before the period ended on a goal by Ron Gordon.

Redmen didn't let up in the third period and scored twice in the first four minutes to take a 3-2 lead. Tom Bell and newcomer John Taylor were the marksmen.

Monteith's second goal tied the count but Skippy Kerner put McGill back into the lead, 4-3, a minute later. Monteith then completed his hat trick, on his second power-play goal in a row, to tie the score for good, 4-4.

Saturday night against Gaels, it was Fuller's turn for the hat trick. The game was also a personal triumph for Varsity netminder Larry Soden, who recorded his first shutout in two seasons as a Blue.

Blues only played as well as they had to as Queen's was short on quality, as expected. Gaels, however, managed to cause a mild flurry of excitement among the rare partisan crowd in the rink in the second period when they tested Soden with several tough shots.

Fuller and Monteith scored first-period goals, Ward Passi added one in the second and George Olah squeezed one in between two more by Fuller in the final frame.

In the third period, Fuller and Olah each scored unas-

STRAY SHOTS: Blues outshot McGill, 32-20, and hit goal posts four times on clear chances. . . . Stu McNeil was nicked for five stitches in the face against Queen's. . . . Sonny Osborne did not play Saturday night but will be ready for Blues' next game. . . . Varsity's regular schedule continues next term but Blues have games scheduled against U. of Michigan next weekend and in the Christmas tournament at Boston. . . . Rookie Hank Monteith picked up three assists in the two games.

Civil rights group bids for U of T support

SAC president Doug Ward listens while Tom Wakayama, SNCC organizer, explains the organization's objectives.

A bid for support of the Students' Non-violent Coordinating Committee, one of the South's leading civil rights organizations, was made at a meeting Monday by Tom Wakayama.

Wakayama, a SNCC organizer from Western University, outlined the need for moral as well as financial support from University of Toronto students: "You have a common involvement with them in education," he said.

SAC President Doug Ward (III Emm) explained that U of T is already a member of the Canadian "Friends of Snick" organization. The main purpose of the meeting, he said, was to hear ideas on what form support should take and methods to be used in raising money.

Suggestions for fund-raising included a lecture-hall sit-in and the formation of a White Citizens' Council—both presented humorously.

The student action group will be discussing SNCC at its next meeting, Monday at 5 p.m. in Hart House's South Sitting Room.

Liberals announce new cabinet

The Liberal Party, victorious in last Friday's Model Parliament election has announced its Cabinet: Prime Minister—Ivan McFarlane (IV Trin); Trade and Commerce Deputy Prime Minister—Don Moggridge (III Trin); External Affairs House Leader—Michael Levine (III UC); Dominion-Provincial Affairs—Colin Campbell (II Vic); Justice—Dave Runnals (II Vic); National Health and Welfare Whip—Tone Careless (II Trin); Deputy Whip—Bill Holt (II Vic); Industry—Gil Reid (IV Trin); Labor—Bill Porter (IV Trin); National Defence—Frank Felkai (III UC); Associate Defence—Paul King (IV UC); Finance—Steve Zacks (II UC); National Revenue—Barbara Walsh (III SMC); Transport—Charles Dunbar (I Trin); Veteran's Affairs—Margaret Buga (Nurs); Citizenship and Immigration—Ian Morrison (III Vic); Education—Bruce Kidd (III UC); Fisheries—Leigh Firestone (I UC); Postmaster-General—Diana Hunt (III Trin); Public Works—Neil McLeod (I Trin); Secretary of State—Elizabeth McLeod (II Trin); Agriculture—Jim Bannister (III Vic); Mines and Technical Surveys—Ron Birken (II New); Forestry—Cindy Harcourt (II Vic); Northern Affairs National Resources—Gail Keyes (III Vic); Ministers without Portfolio—Len Shifrin (III Law); Ed Roberts (III Law); David Haigh (III Law).

Model Parliament will not sit in Queen's Park chamber

Model Parliament will not be held in the Queen's Park legislative chamber in January.

The announcement was made last night by Model Parliament chairman Ian Thompson (OCE).

Renovations in seating and acoustics in preparation for the spring session of the legislature will be nearing completion during the week when Model Parliament usually sits, Thompson said.

"This certainly is a blow to the Parliament. Being able to sit in the chamber was half the fun."

Seeley Hall at Trinity College is available, Thompson said, but he added the Model Parliament organizers were "looking for a better spot."

He said many of the student politicians had suspected the possibility of not being able to use the chamber because of occupancy by the legislature.

Expect explosion at SAC meet over Winter Carnival ticket sales

The issue of block sales of seats at the Winter Carnival Ice Show may produce a lively Students' Administrative Council tonight.

At the last meeting the Blue and White Society was asked to consider limiting a large portion of the central blocks of Varsity Arena to individual sales and prohibiting block sales in this area. They will report back tonight.

The issue produced considerable friction between the Blue and White Society and the SAC last year when on the night before the tickets went on sale the SAC executive commission decided to limit block sales to the end sections.

Phil Epstein (III UC), president of the UC Literary and Athletic society, has already indicated his disapproval of such sales, while others on the council support them.

"The unorganized student doesn't have a chance to get a good seat," Epstein said last night. He was referring to purchases of most of the best seats by fraternities or other student groups which leave few good seats left for individuals.

He proposed that the arena be split in half from the goals, half available for group sales and the other for individual or small purchases.

Other motions to come up for debate include a move to change the word "undergraduate" to "student" in the SAC constitution, an endorsement of "O Canada" as our national anthem for all SAC and university functions, and an amendment to the Torontonensis contract providing for payment of 1/3 of the salary upon delivery of the graduate volume and the remainder on delivery of the activities volume.

Say sex in residence better than in brothels

Trinity College students' reasons for their recent request for extended visiting hours for women are not as articulate as those from Harvard students.

A report Tuesday from undergraduates to the Harvard Council stated "even if deep and emotional commitments and ties occasionally lead to sexual intercourse", freer laws would be better than the old days when students frequented brothels.

College Dean John Monro described the student report as a demonstration of the latest in a "succession of serious violations" against existing parietal rules.

"What was once considered a pleasant privilege has now, for a growing number of students, come to be considered a license to use college rooms for wild parties or for sexual intercourse," Monro had said earlier.

'Who am I?' queries priest

The question "Who am I?" is the key to finding ultimate truth or love itself, a St. Michael's College Basilian priest said Monday.

Speaking on Love is Truth, a topic chosen "for its shock value," Rev. S.A. Kutz said self-knowledge came only from association with and love from others.

"A child isolated from birth and cared for mechanically would never have the opportunity to discover who it is because it would never know anyone else of whom it could ask 'Who are you?', and in return receive love.

"Only when we are loved and recognize ourselves as loved are we free. Only when we are loved are we liberated from the need to prove ourselves, because someone else now stands for us.

"I am the one whom the Father loves, the brother of Christ. I am the one in whom God's holy spirit lives and acts"—this was the Christian answer to the ultimate question of the would-be-lover proposed by Fr. Kutz.

Bring your books to aid WUS drive for universities

Beg, borrow or steal them, but bring out your books.

The World University Service is starting a book drive on campus in early January to aid the University of Algiers and Skopje University in Yugoslavia, both of which were recently destroyed, and to stock university libraries and book exchanges overseas.

Students are asked to check their book shelves at home and at school in preparation for the campaign.

The main books needed are standard senior high school and university texts on the social sciences, medical and other professional books, critical and reference works and dictionaries.

A general campus book blitz for students and faculty will take place next term with collection bins at strategic points.

The main problem in the campaign is the cost of shipping. Students are asked to donate money for this reason.

Varsity challenges SAC to hockey tilt

The Varsity has officially challenged the SAC to a hockey game in Varsity Arena during the Winter Carnival Weekend, Jan. 31-Feb. 2.

Blue and White Committee chairman Don Cunningham said he felt the SAC would be more than glad to battle The Varsity and he would try to arrange ice time.

The Varsity-SAC hockey game was a traditional affair until discontinued two years ago.

Early betting on the game has been heavily in favor of The Varsity.

Rename farm

The name of the Caledon Hills Farm has been officially changed.

The Hart House Caledon Hills Farm Committee, which administers the farm, has announced that it now will be known as the Hart House Farm.

The change was prompted by legal complications from a neighboring cattle farm, which has a copyright on the name Caledon Hills Farm for branding its cattle.

The farm, which is owned by Hart House, will use the new name on legal documents and in official correspondence, but will continue to be known popularly as Caledon Hills Farm.

soon working again."

The press distributes books on a subscription basis. Subscribers undertake to purchase a copy of each book produced by the press, up to the price of 2 guineas a year.

Included in the display here is a charming volume of 15th century Christmas lyrics.

The Benedictine community started in 1625 in Flanders and soon moved to its present location. There are about 70 nuns in the community.

"There is a strong scholarly tradition there," said Miss Blackstock.

The press is the only 19th century one still operating in England and, as far as is known, in the world.

It was set up in 1876 with a single hand press. Now power presses are used.

Grille separates nun from printing expert

Outside the grille a man crouched, speaking quietly to the nun on the other side.

He was telling her how to fix a printing press.

The press is at the unique Stanbrook Abbey at Callow End, Worcestershire, England. There, Dame Hildelith Cumming and about five printers produce beautiful limited editions on exquisite paper—often hand illuminated.

A display of work from this press now is in the lobby of the Sigmund Samuel wing of the main library.

The collection belongs to Cicely Blackstock, a member of the staff of the Rare Book Room of the library. Miss Blackstock visited the abbey last year and talked through the grille to Dame Hildelith.

"It's a cloistered abbey," said Miss Blackstock in an interview yesterday, "and nobody can go in. Last year when a press broke down, Dame Hildelith sent a telegram to the British Museum and an expert came up to the abbey."

"He directed her through the grille and the press was # christian morality — r.i.p.

About this time every year the sleeping beast, Christian Morality, wakes, rubs the sleep from his eyes and rises for his brief annual visit to the human beings who inhabit much of this world.

His job, which in the past was fairly strenuous and occasionally a year-round occupation, has now dwindled to part-time work for two or three weeks during the Christmas rush.

Christian Morality's position is somewhat like that of the small handicrafter: for most purposes he has been supplanted by modern methods, but for special events he is still called into service.

Just as spectators gather around a handicraft demonstration at an industrial trade fair, so do Christians gather around a revived Christian Morality at Christmas. As long as the show runs, the interest of both groups is intense and genuine.

But when the fair closes the handicrafter is sent back to work on the assembly line, and by the time the new year is under way Christian Morality returns to sleep until the next birthday of his author.

There is a difference between the spectators and the Christians, however. While the former are intrigued with the handicrafter and nostalgic when they think of his old position in society, they generally agree that the modern methods are better.

But most Christians do not realize that Christian Morality has left their midst. The spectators know the handicrafter has been replaced with mass production, the assembly line and planned obsolescence. But Christians do not know — or at least, do not admit — that Christian Morality has been replaced with prejudice, hatred, hypocrisy, war and greed — to mention only a few.

For two or three weeks a year Christians express a genuine regard for peace, love for their fellow man and a sense of selflessness. But for the rest of the year they condone the acquisition of weapons designed to kill, treat some of their fellow men as vermin and lustily pursue their materialistic paths.

But what is worse is that often the same Christians who practise peace and goodwill during the Christmas season condemn as cowards those persons who advocate the same practices year-round. War is bad at Christmas, but can be justified at other times; Christian charity prevails at Christmas, but for the rest of the year the needy can find for themselves.

The demise of the handicrafter is compensated for by what in many ways are better methods; but the demise of Christian Morality has generally been replaced by the evils that persist in infesting the human mind.

We wish all our readers a Merry Christmas, but suggest that they might do well to retain Christian Morality — at least until as good a replacement can be found.

Charles le Grand Part 2: de Gaulle

By WILLIA SHEARSON

"Only a few months ago, leaders and journalists across the Channel, the Rhine, and the Atlantic, were extravagantly praising the great statesman who had known how to give independence to Algeria. Today, there is unbridled rage against the arrogant monster who is destroying Europe. Yet this is one and the same man."

Alfred Grosser, in Int. Affairs, April, 1963.

De Gaulle has presented a brazen face to the Anglo-Saxon world and we do not like it. Paul-Henri Spaak, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Belgium, spoke for us when he said,

"It becomes clearer and clearer that Jan. 14th, 1963, is fated to go down in history as the 'Black Monday' of both European policy and Atlantic policy. What occurred on that day was something much more significant than the mere dooming of negotiations between Great Britain and the European Community. It was in plain fact an attack on the Atlantic Alliance and the European Community — an attack, that is, on the two most significant achievements of the Free World since the end of the Second World War."

In the mind of Charles de Gaulle, what happened on that day was certainly not an attack on the European Community. It involved the opposite in so far as he pointed out that the European Community must be European and not a Europe-attached-to-America. What Mr. Spaak should have said was that Jan. 14, 1963, was the "Black Monday" of Anglo-Saxon policy in Europe. For since the Second World War, western European policy has been formed in Washington, with a concurring opinion from London.

De Gaulle however, was willing to see England converted. Two things led to the disillusionment of that hope. First, Britain asked various concessions of the European Economic Council before she would enter. Secondly, the Nassau agreement showed that London still considered herself as a satellite of Washington. The first would not have been fatal to Britain's entry as far as de Gaulle was concerned. The Nassau Agreement was disastrous.

De Gaulle's thinking contains the vision of Europe emerging as a third great power in the world. What he thinks of as Europe is not wholly clear. But it certainly does not include America, or American policy, and therefore, if his policy towards Britain was an attack on the Atlantic Alliance, it is because de Gaulle does not consider that Alliance to be an alliance at all, but simply a method by which the Anglo-Saxon world can go on controlling Europe's destiny. His hostility to Britain is a manifestation of his hostility to America.

What then are the grounds for this attitude towards Washington? First, there is the conviction that all nations act in their own interest, and that American interests cannot be those of Europe. From this it follows that for Europe to pursue a policy that is made in the United States, is not to do what is best for Europe. For de Gaulle, this is political idiocy and a form of international slavery.

Secondly, from certain events in the past, he is convinced that America is only capable of acting against the most flagrant challenges to her own sovereignty, and therefore, if the chips were down, she might rush to the United Nations rather than act overtly against a challenge to Western Europe from the East.

Thirdly, de Gaulle has repeatedly said that the division of Europe is the most intolerable result of the Second World War. He holds the United States and Russia responsible for this division, and sees in the Yalta Conference a typical agreement concerning Europe without the European nations being represented. Furthermore, the Berlin Wall, the symbol of a divided Europe, was constructed without any direct action on the part of America.

At his press conference of July 29th, 1963, de Gaulle said,

"It remains true that the Soviet Bloc is holding fast to its totalitarian and menacing ideology. It has shown by the scandal of the Berlin wall and the introduction of nuclear weapons into Cuba, how precarious peace remains through its own acts. France will not be diverted by the Moscow agreements from equipping herself with the means of immeasurable destruction possessed by the other powers. France would not subscribe to some arrangement that would be carried out above her head, and which would concern Europe and notably Germany."

This is a singularly revealing statement. It not only bears out the three points that we have just made, but it shows to what extent de Gaulle is suspicious of agreements between Russia and the United States. He believes that the division of Europe is to the advantage of both those powers, and that treaties between them tend to reaffirm that division and extend it indefinitely; the recent test ban treaty is simply another Yalta.

What then does de Gaulle wish to do? First, he wishes to persuade the other Western European countries that their real interests lie with Europe and not with America. It is particularly important that he persuade Germany of this, and he attempts to do so by showing how Moscow, through the suggestion of various treaties with America, is trying to manoeuvre Washington into implicit recognition of the division of Europe; a manoeuvre which is apparently in the process of being successful.

Secondly, he realises that the European nations such as France have no real power at the conference table even if they are invited, because they lack the weapons which give one a bargaining position in the modern world. De Gaulle hopes to gain this power through his "force de frappe."

In the press conference referred to above, he went on to say,

"As for the proposal of a non-aggression pact which we are told was talked about in Moscow, between the states belonging to NATO and the leaders of the countries subject to the yoke of the Kremlin, I must say at once that France does not like this assimilation between the Atlantic Alliance and Communist Servitude."

These are the words of a man who believes that the battle against communism is not really being fought at all, or that if it is, it is being fought without regard to the countries over which the battle rages. As the European stake in this battle is enormous, it is imperative that Europe be allowed full and equal say in how that battle is to be fought. This position can only be gained through economic security, political independence, and the weapons of modern warfare. De Gaulle is trying to lead Europe to all three of these solutions.

There are many who wonder how de Gaulle has come this far. The question which has often been asked is: why cannot the other European countries in the Atlantic Alliance, backed up by British and American influence, put France in her place? The answer is that the long range of any real influence is tries whose policies are the special concern of Washington, such as France in the Suez crisis — a situation in which France was embarrassed by the United States in the eyes of the entire world.

De Gaulle is a man who considers that his legitimacy is historical rather than elective. He is committed to historical action rather than historical acceptance.
America and Russia are more or less committed to the maintenance of the European status quo in a situation in which Europe is not standing still. De Gaulle is trying to give it the direction through which it can fulfil its historical destiny as a great world force.

It is not that he feels some necessity of transcending the East-West conflict.
He merely quarrels with our definitions of East and West. As long as the West is led by the Anglo-Saxons, the non Anglo-Saxon West will suffer. As long as the East is thought of as the Communist bloc, many European countries are doomed to eternal servitude. Neither situation is tolerable for Europeans. The only way out is to gain the weapons of modern bargaining power.

Only then will France be able to both lead Europe, and protect her interests at the conference table. For if de Gaulle gains his striking force, he could, especially with the cooperation of Germany, prevent treaties between the USA and Russia, made over the heads of Europe, thereby watching over the long-range interests of those European countries who presently have no say in anything.
These long-range interests cannot be anything less than the ultimate freeing of the Iron Curtain countries, and their reassimilation to the historical roots from which they have sprung.

I have chosen two quotes from two Frenchmen which attempt to sum up de Gaulle. The first comes from Jacques Soustelle, dedicated enemy of de Gaulle, who says,

"His vision of the world is vast but archaic; it is that of the 19th century, even of the 18th or 17th. He imagines the world as a tournament of states, as a field on which is played the grandiose game of the 'Sacred Monsters' (He loves to quote Nietzsche's phrase,
'the State, the coldest of cold monsters') His ambition for himself and for his country, with which he identifies himself, is to be in the top rank among those who direct the game"

We hope we have made it clear we do not entirely agree. Soustelle does not accept de Gaulle's premise that modern Europe is in a revolutionary situation, and the General would be the first to call America reactionary about the current situation. One might have wished Soustelle to tell us what a proper 20th century vision should be and if he had, I suspect it would beg every Gaulist question.

We must not make the mistake of un-derestimating de Gaulle or, of failing to take him seriously. For if we do so, we fail to notice the realities of the current European situation. Europe is progressing at an enormous rate, and it is unlikely that she will be content to remain in a secondary position of power in the world — especially if she is led by a man like de Gaulle, who, in the words of Raymond Aron,

"Is the absolute master of the essential areas of government, contemptuous of all the bickering, snarling, and back-biting of the politicians, liberal toward his critics, and indifferent about prosaic workaday questions."

De Gaulle does not understand, we say, thus showing that we do not understand him. Or perhaps, we understand all too well.

AFTER TWO MICHIGAN GAMES

Kane crew faces tough test in Boston puck tournament

By GORD BELLMORE

The big Christmas college hockey tournament at Boston, Dec. 21-23, will be a tough test for Varsity Blues.

Entered in the tournament are Minnesota, the top team in U.S. college hockey last year, Harvard, Boston College, Boston U., and Northeastern. These teams are all from hockey hotbeds in the U.S., the northeast and upper Great Lakes regions.

American teams don't play in regular leagues but participate in a season-long series of games, the results of which make up their season's records. By this method, Blues would now be 6-0-1 this season.

Canadian college teams have had little success with U.S. opposition in recent years. Last year's Canadian national champions, McMaster Marliners, were defeated by several teams in their exhibition games south of the border.

Consequently, Blues will be underdogs at Boston, and coach Joe Kane hopes to have his team at full strength for the trip. Unlike the U.S. college players, who are all undergraduates, many of the Blues are in demanding professional or post-graduate courses, and hockey is necessarily secondary in importance.

These tournaments, several of which are slated for different parts of the U.S. during the holidays, are big, gala affairs. To the American teams they are the highlight of the season, while to Blues the tournament is an exhibition series, no more.

Blues, therefore, face a tough task. They will meet excellent teams, they must overcome the mental problem of getting keyed up for the action, and they may be forced to play without some top players.

This weekend, Blues travel to Ann Arbor, Mich. for two games with U. of Michigan Wolverines. Last fall at Varsity Arena, Michigan defeated Blues, 4-2, despite netminder Larry Soden's finest game as a Blue.

Blues will be without Stu McNeil and Ian Sinclair for the Michigan trip. They are tied up with school work. Centre Sonny Osborne, who suffered a badly cut eye last Friday at McGill, will not be ready but will play in Boston.

Pete Burwash in Orange Bowl tennis meet

University of Toronto freshman Pete Burwash will team up with David Brown to play in the 17th annual Orange Bowl International junior tennis championship at Flamingo Park in Miami, December 22-29.

Burwash, 18, is the senior intercollegiate singles champ and Brown, 16, is top-ranked in the under-16 class in Ontario.

This is the first time Canada will be represented in the annual international tournament which this year has entries from 15 nations.

UWO meet opens college season

By SHEL KRAKOFKY

Varsity opens its season of intercollegiate swimming Saturday with a dual meet against Western Mustangs in London.

Blues will be at full strength for the annual Varsity-Western clash, which has developed an intense rivalry between the two squads. The teams haven't competed against each other since Blues won the title last year but indications are the rivalry will be as fierce as ever.

At Varsity's intrasquad meet Friday, which was won 66-22 by the veterans over the frosh, Tony Little was a very interested spectator.

Little is a former Western swimmer who is now attending U of T. Although eligible, he did not try out for the Toronto squad. On Friday, Little recorded times and made notes on the Varsity swimmers and promptly mailed them to Mustang coach Bob Eynon.

Rumor has it that versatile Glen Davis, who has been one of the Western stalwarts over the years, has left the team. Varsity coaches Larry Freeman and John Ridpath are somewhat reluctant to believe the story since other stories emanating from 'Stangtown over the years have proven to be false and only typified the competitive psychology employed by Eynon and his charges.

BABY BUBBLES: Plans are being made to send Tom Verth and Graeme Barber to Fort Lauderdale over the holidays to attend a swimming clinic conducted by Dr. J. Counsellman. Doc Counsellman is acknowledged as the world's foremost swimming authority, and has coached a multitude of international champions, one of whom is Tom Verth . . .

Other Blues will spend the holidays practising for meets against highly-rated teams from Colgate and Bowling Green. Both these meets will take place in Toronto early in the new year. Kal Schneider, who missed the intrasquad affair with the flu, appears ready for the Western junket.

Gagers end year in U.S. against Buffalo, Rochester

by PAUL HENDERSON

Varsity Basketball Blues journey south of the border Friday for their final games before the Christmas recess.

Blues play at Buffalo State Friday night, then go to Rochester University Saturday.

During the past three seasons, Blues have lost twice to Buffalo while winning a single match. In 1960-61, Buffalo defeated Toronto, 86-72, at Hart House. The following year, State triumphed, 84-64, on its home court.

Blues gained partial revenge last season by edging Buffalo, 90-89, here. The Gagers will not play any further games until an exhibition tilt against Waterloo Lutheran, Jan. 8, at Hart House.

Under The Basket: Coach John Metras of perennial contenders Western Mustangs claims his squad is better than last year's second-place finishers. The unexpected return of former all-star guard Leo Innocente may have prompted Metras to make the statement. Innocente will undoubtedly team up with Tom Williamson, 1962-63 all-star guard and scoring champion, to form one of the most dangerous duos in the intercollegiate loop.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

PHE evens lacrosse final with 10-9 comeback win

By AL SCHOENBORN

Physical and Health Education evened up the interfaculty lacrosse final series for the Daloe Trophy at one game apiece with a sensational 10-9 comeback victory over St. Mike's A yesterday.

It was St. Mike's first loss of the season.

The Irish built up an 8-3 lead in the first half as they outthrust and outchecked a feeble-looking PHE squad. PHE outscored St. Mike's in the second half, 7-1, to post the big win.

PHE had tried to spark its team by using a new goalkeeper, erstwhile forward Larry Nancekivell. But in the first half this move didn't appear to have any effect as Nancekivell received a rough eight-goal baptism.

The turning point came at the start of the second half when the Irish, apparently confident of their five-goal margin, put some of their second line into the game. This was the first time in the best-of-three series either team had dared to make such a move.

Before the game once more became a battle of first lines, Phys. Ed. had closed the gap to 8-5. Then with the help of a few goal posts and sparkling saves by Nancekivell, PHE pecked away at the Double Blue cushion.

With less than three minutes left in the game Don Arthurs broke a 9-9 tie to put PHE into the lead for the first time. Nancekivell held St. Mike's off the scoresheet for the remainder of the game.

Don Arthurs again led the way for the winners, hitting for five goals. Barry Bartlett returned to full-time duty and scored two goals as did Jim McElroy. Bill Watters added the other tally.

Probably the most impressive man on the floor was George Olah who played his usual stalwart game on defence for St. Mike's while also potting four goals. Don Schmidt also hit for four goals and Barry Fleming got a singleton.

The deciding game is scheduled for tomorrow at 1 p.m.

VOLLEYBALL

Jr. SPS defeated Meds III yr. 15-6. 15-13 Thursday night creating an all-Skule final for the interfac volleyball crown.

The final contest will take place in the upper Hart House Gym today at 5 p.m.

HOCKEY

UCR Redmen, an ordinary second division team last year, have gone undefeated to the Christmas layoff in Group I action after a 3-1 win over Sr. SPS.

Marv Glazier, Doug Whelpdale and Ron Hanna counted for the Red and White while Gary Reed blinked the red light for Skule.

The win moved UC into first place, two points ahead of Vic I.

Meds A moved into first place in Group II with a 2-0 win over Dentistry A on goals by Bob Bear and Pete Strachan.

Vic II handed St. Mike's B its third straight loss 2-1. Gary Davidson and Pete Marchant scored for the winners.

A Group III contest saw Jr. Skule move into first place on an 8-4 win over PHE II. Ron Arends paced the winners with a hat trick while Lyle Urquhart added a pair.

Intermediate League results: Vic X 3, Trin E 2; St. Mike's D 2, SPS V 2; Vic III 1, Dent B O; SPS IX 5, Vic IX 1; St. Mike's F 2, Trin E 2.

BASKETBALL

UC I remains in first place in Group I after a narrow 38-33 win over Sr. SPS. Peter Peskun led Redmen with 13 points.

varsity sports editor

This was the year that was supposed to be

With the last sports page of 1963, it is once again time for the sports editor of The Varsity to take the daring step and either stand or fall on the authoritative predictions he made one year ago in this space.

In case you've forgotten (although I can't conceive of this), one year ago this sage (sic) reviewed his prognostication for 1962 and discovered that of 18 predictions, with a slight bit of manoeuvring, 17 had come true. This was an impressive percentage of 94.4.

With this incentive and his confidence boosted to the hilt, the Varsity sports editor then unravelled the story that was to unfold in 1963. In all, 48 predictions were printed in this column in the Varsities of Dec. 14, 1962 and Jan. 4, 1963.

Here are those predictions and the actual results:

● Varsity Hockey Blues will edge Laval Rouge et Or in the standings on the final weekend of the season to win the Eastern Division title. Varsity's record will be 8-4.

(Blues defeated Laval, 12-3, on the final weekend of the season, but unfortunately Rouge et Or had clinched the Eastern Division title the week before. Varsity's record was 8-4.) 1 right, 1 wrong.

● McMaster Marlins will win the two-game final series for the Queen's Cup, 13-8.

(Marlins defeated Laval in the series. But the total score was 12-7.) 1 right, 1 wrong.

● Stu McNeil will win the Eastern Division scoring crown by one point although five other players will have more goals.

(McNeil tied for third place behind Ward Passi, the winner, and Steve Monteith. McNeil had 19 assists but only two goals; 28 players scored more goals.) 2 wrong.

● Ward Passi will be the highest scoring rookie in the Eastern Division.

(Passi scored 19 goals, more than any other player in the Division.) 1 right.

● Steve Monteith and Stu McNeil will be the only Blues selected to the first all-star team. Larry Soden, Ward Passi and Sonny Osborne will make the second team.

(Monteith and McNeil were selected to the first all-star team, but so were Passi and Osborne. Soden failed to make either team.) 2 right, 3 wrong.

● Varsity basketball Blues will have a 9-3 record but will finish second to Assumption Lancers in the race for the Western Division championship.

(The cagers were 7-5 and finished third. Lancers did win the title with a 10-0 record.) 1 right, 2 wrong.

● Guard Dave West will score more points than any other player in the intercollegiate league.

(This honor went to Western guard Tom Williamson, who scored 269 points. West was second with 247.) 1 wrong.

● Bruce Kidd will rise further into the heights of stardom with victories in Los Angeles, Boston, New York, Chicago, Toronto, Syracuse and New Orleans. For the Pan-American Games to be held in Sao Paulo, Brazil, Bruce will only enter the six-mile event and will win by a 2.8-second margin.

(Kidd won races in L.A., Boston, New York, Toronto, Syracuse and New Orleans. But he lost to Jim Beatty in Chicago and didn't race in Cleveland or Sao Paulo.) 6 right, 3 wrong.

● This will be the year of decision for Bill Crothers after his disappointing showing at Perth. But Crothers will meet the test with impressive victories indoors.

place with a 59-57 win over St. Mike's A.

Jim Holowachuck led the winners with 18 points, followed by Andy Klimas with 16 and Art Bennett with 12 points. High man in the game was Ray Schaedler, who hooped 20 points for the Irish.

Chuck Homer scored 11 points and Ivan Rempel 10 to lead Vic I to a resounding 54-20 win over New College.

Meds A defeated Dentistry A 44-21 while Architecture A took Trinity A, 30-21. A third contest saw St. Mike's B trounce PHE II 39-21.

(Crothers won numerous indoor races, including the U.S. 1,000-yard championship.) 1 right.

● Varsity quarterback Jim Israel will change his current plans for retirement and will be Blues' top signal-caller next year. Bryce Taylor, who will also see plenty of q.b. action as well as playing defence, and Harold Hall will round out a powerful quarterback brigade.

(Israel returned to action and was Blues' first-string q.b. Taylor played some quarterback and was selected to the Canadian Press all-star team as a defensive back. Hall was Blues' third quarterback although he saw all his action at halfback.) 3 right.

● Bill Watters will still be in Blues' backfield despite rumors of his being converted to linebacker.

(Watters did play fullback but also was an all-star linebacker.) 1 right, 1 wrong.

● The intercollegiate football league will present an even closer race in 1963 than it did in 1962. Blues will be a much-improved club and will not be defeated by any great margin in any of their league games. Nonetheless, Blues will have a 3-3 record.

(Queen's walked away with the Yates Cup on a 6-0 record. Although Blues lost four games by a total of only 13 points, they did get bombed by Western, 52-15. Their record was 1-5.) 3 wrong.

● Queen's Golden Gaels will win the Yates Cup. (They did.) 1 right.

● Bill Bewley, McGill Redmen coach, will be quoted on at least one occasion as saying: "If only we still had Skyepek."

(Although this quote never appeared in print, Bewley must have said it. Before the season was over both his quarterbacks, Glen St. John and Gary Cullen, were sidelined with injuries.) 1 right.

● Blues will place six players on the Coaches' All-Star Team, Erkki Pukonen, Jim Rhodes, Ranny Parker, Kenny Davison, Arnie Carefoote and Doug Bucknam.

(Davison made the team, Bucknam didn't. The other four players were ineligible to play for Blues.) 1 right, 5 wrong.

● Brian Conacher of Western will win the scoring title.

(Conacher left Western to play hockey for UBC's Canadian Olympic team. Willie Lambert of McGill won the scoring title.) 1 wrong.

● Vic will win the T.A. Reed Trophy with more than 15,000 points.

(Vic won the trophy, but only with 11,838 points. Forestry had more than 15,000 points in winning the Division II section of the award.) 1 wrong.

● Varsity Rugby Blues will go undefeated to their fifth consecutive Turner Trophy.

(The ruggerites were undefeated and they did win the Turner.) 2 right.

● Vic will win its sixth Mulock Cup in a row. (They did.) 1 right.

● And, a year from now the Varsity sports editor will have lost many of his freinds. (Well... what's a friend here and there.) 1 right.

Total Record: 24 right, 24 wrong. Pct: 50.0 That's not up to my 94.4 percentage of last year, but, you understand, things are tough all around.

As for the 1964 prognostication, I'll spare you that until the new year.

Until then, have a happy holiday and a successful New Year.

P. O. Maude, Editor

The Varsity Literary Edition would like to thank the people who contributed for proving that there are writers left on campus.

Since Jargon was cancelled by the SAC, no campus-wide literary magazine has existed. It seems evident that there is a demand for such a magazine in the light of interest shown in the Varsity's literary edition.

Due to lack of time and money it was decided to use the regular newspaper format instead of a magazine form. At least it is hoped you will all have some interesting reading material over the holidays.

Contributions consisted mainly of poetry, but a few short stories were submitted. The quality of the poetry was generally better than that of the prose.

Comment concerning the idea of a campus-wide literary magazine and the writing published in this issue would be appreciated. Please address all correspondence to P.O. Maude, The Varsity.

Note: Manuscripts may be picked up at the SAC office in January.

"All college professors are cretins and also Snots", the hairy-chested hero cried.
The pasty-face professor squatting
Beside him
Nodded and smiled
Nodded and smiled

"It's gonads are going to save this country, Gonads!" cried hairy-chest.
"Who's got 'em?"

"Oh you have you have" breathed pasty-face
And smiled
Nodded and smiled

Hairy-chest arouse,
Revolved, and farting gently through his teeth,
Removed his shirt, his pants, his underwear,
His splendid pectoral hair,
And, with large mien, passed them to the crowd,
Passed his hairy valuables to the crowd.

Yet could not sign autographs, being Already late for his next poetry lecture.
Pasty-face beat it too, even though he didn't Have to start lecturing for another hour.

THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWING

By John Langevin

Once upon a time there lived in a little green grove in the Emerald Isle a little green leprechaun named Sidney. Sidney was happy healthy, and spritely — in fact, all that the well-adjusted leprechaun should be. He swam in the cold, clear little pond; he frolicked with the chipmunks and whistled with the birds; he explored the woods; often he would lie on his back in the soft grass, fanned by the gentle, fresh breeze, gazing at the quivering leaves of the trees and blue sky overhead; other times he would go for walks in the evening, looking with awe at the stars and listening to the mysterious rustlings of night; sometimes, after supper, he would sit at his door and render Irish folkballads. But his most creative pastime, encouraged by the solitude and beauty and peace which surrounded him, was the writing of poetry. He was blissfully unaware of his nation's great pastimes—civil war, starvation, and writing plays. In short, Sidney was a thoroughly enviable creature in his state of nature.

But one day, after the pond had grown too cold for swimming, and the wind had assumed a bitter edge, and his fingers tingled in the cold and impaired the production of poetry, he had a profoundly moving experience. He thought. It happened as he huddled by his little fire of smouldering peat and underwent a fit of depression. Admittedly, this depression resulted from nothing more than a touch of indigestion but he had never been depressed before. Poor Sidney! As he cringed motionless for hours two substantial sensations gradually emerged: a concern for his role in life and a feeling of malaise he couldn't put his finger on, but which any unattached young person would readily recognize.

Despite his recovery from the indigestion, Sidney failed to recover from his depression. Having no formal education and a mediocre

IQ, thought was a pretty halting process, and it didn't do him any good. The cold held him confined in his hollow tree home, and he frequently attempted to drown his sorrows in kegs of icy, clear strong dew. He couldn't eat, he grew lean and a lighter green, he chain-smoked and drank black coffee, and he lay around moaning and groaning. Writing poetry failed to help him escape, and besides, it didn't turn out very well anyway. Suicide was contemplated in the gloomy recesses of his little green mind.

One morning, after he had smoothed his bed of dried oak leaves and choked down a little creme de menthe and a mint leaf sandwich, he happened to glance at the calendar. It was Christmas Day, and his loneliness struck him in a sudden, sharp pang. He gazed out the knot-hole, trying to take an interest in something and get his mind off himself, but the vista of grey sky and bleak snowscape and grim silence only made him feel worse. Green tears began to roll down his repulsive green face. How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable it all was! He tossed down a few shots of dew, but, they only made him bilious. Lying on the floor retching in the oppressive stale air of his dirty hollow, he resolved to hang himself.

Just as he kicked away the chair and dangled by a knotted shirt, however, a deep, elegant voice said:

"Shame, you ungrateful wretch!" In a second he was cut down, and lying stunned on the floor, he saw a glorious angel returning a fiery, long sword to its sheath.

"The Lord God, out of His infinite mercy and grace, taking pity on your revolting self, has sent me to deliver a Christmas gift to recall you from your atheistic despair!" contemptuously intoned the angel. Poof, and the angel vanished. Poof, and the gift appeared.

Sidney was wide-eyed and gaping. Before him stood a gorgeous little blonde gnome clad in a white turtle-neck sweater, moss green ski pants, a leopard-sin ski Jacket, and little leather boots. Sidney instinctively realised that here was the answer to his vague discomfort, and he felt noticeably warmer. He squirmed and sputtered under the gaze of her twinkling blue eyes, and couldn't form a coherent sentence. At last he stammered: "Who are you?"

"I'm Univertha L. Panatheta," lisped the gnome.

"Oh," said Sidney, "that's a strange name."

"It's Greek, but I'm Thcottish," she explained.

"Oh, I see," nodded Sidney sagely, quite baffled by the symbol confronting him.

"Thank you," quoth the gnome.

But henceforth, even with the gnome, life was no bed of roses for Sidney. He was nervous about just what his relations with her should be, and he still worried about his part in destiny. She taught him to ski, they went tobogganing and skating, they played chess in the evenings over hot mugs of Irish coffee, but something was wrong — he just couldn't relax. Finally the gnome became irritated and asked him what was the matter.

"I want to know what I'm supposed to do," he replied.

She wrinkled her nose and shrugged: "Purthue happineth."

"But how can one be truly happy?" intently persisted the thoughtful leprechaun.

"By enjoying eating and drinking and thports and a warm fire and crithp winter evening and thleeping with me," she answered.

He blushed and cleared his throat and ventured the opinion that one should "do something in life," as well as taking a suitable interest in politics, international affairs, science, the humanities, philosophy, and religion. The gnome looked positively hurt at the foolishness of her mate.

"Am I beautiful?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Are the trees and flowers and sky and warmth and like that beautiful?" she continued.

"Yes."

"Beauty ith truth, truth beauty, that ith all ye know on earth and all ye need to know!" she summed up. He gnawed his green lip contemplatively. "Look," she expounded, "thomeday t h e whole world will be dethroyed, and nothing anyone can do will make a damn bit of differenthe, and bethides, all anyone hath ever done will be gone."

He quailed before the might of her dialectic. And that night, as Sidney buried his face in the gnome's warmth and softness and fragrance, he was again happy.

The next morning the two wee folk bounded outside into the sunny winter day. Blam, and bits of gnome and leprechaun were splattered all over the nearby trees and bushes. Tommy O'Toole smiled. That new squirrel gun Grampa had given him for Christmas sure worked really great.

In Praise of the Well-bred Virgin

Your body is immaculate and white,
But in your eyes sleepless is the night
without a vow,

Unseen erotic inscriptions
Spread on your breasts and stamp your brow.

You thirst for more than the carousing prostitute
Your nocturnal hours are fuller of ill repute,
On your lips humid lies,
In your swagger sullied sighs hover.

Lies and the Devil give good security
For this your famous virginity
without a vow,

Unseen erotic inscriptions
Spread on your breasts and stamp your brow.

Miss Coquette's heart belongs to Santa!

What do you want for Christmas Miss Coquette? How about darily open evening shoes in black suede, gold, patent, or dyeable satin? Or a Coquette-matched handbag? Or could it be fur-soft slippers in stylings that are always completely sophisticated and never completely sane? How about putting your Christmas wish in a Santa-red Coquette box? And then—if your heart belongs to Santa—Santa's heart will belong to Miss Coquette.

Sea Change

I was born in a coastal town by the side of the wild green sea and the rocks and the fog and the clean salt air are the deepest part of me.

I ran free where the cliff meets sand and the starfish and seaweed lie and the barnacles grew under my bare feet and the misty greyblue sky.

You came late from the prairie wind from the roll of the wide gold plain and the streams that run dry under hot bright sun and the dust and cold and rain.
Young you lived in a violent land of extreme harsh and sudden change in the plain stretching far from the eastern lakes to the westward mountain range.

We two met in an inland town where the winds were strange as they blew, and the distant clinging of sea to sky is the way I cling to you.
I am child of the sunset sea as are you of the prairie sky and the way of the wind and the wide wild waves is the way of you and I.

— Donna Mason

Remords

Like the tempest that rages by night gone in the day, leaving only the flood-spent streams,
the trees torn away,
the damp at the side of the road,
mist from the bog,
and in the first flush of sunrise
a hinting of fog . . .

With only this darkness of forgotten tears in my eyes the morning after you leave me I will arise.

— Donna Mason

Vaya con dios, mi amor

I had to give his ring back;
it was too large for my finger,
too heavy for my hand.
It burned me like a fever, chilled like summer snow, ate like strong dilute acid into my flesh.
I could not forget for the briefest fraction of a moment that it was there:
it occupied my dreams.
Opals and diamonds, a tiny thing golden and lurid,
like a glimpse of hell:
I could not bear it.
It ruined us:
we could not speak.
Amazing discomfort to emanate from such a little source.
I have borne heavier weights upon my body,
yes, greater than my own,
yet could not bear the lightness of a slender golden ring.
He had loved me; I think I had loved him but we were both quite obviously relieved when I gave it back.

— Donna Mason

Poem

This is the new sign I've hung up
That shows I'm a tailor
I'll dress you up any way,
Make you look entirely different.
Scars, blemishes, deformities,
I'll cover them all up
I'll run the cloth over
Every contour of your body,
Fill you in so no one will Worry about your armpits,
Just give me a chance,
I'll clothe you in a way
You never thought possible.
Everyone will forget that you're Just one of us: they'll think You're someone new. You'll be able
(At least, it seems reasonable)
To forget about anything back when.
By the simple trick of clothes
I'll patch you up, revitalize you.
No worries then, you'll be the rave
Of the town, all decked out Like you can't imagine what.

— John Sewell

Largo

This country's summer dwells too long:
The grape has long perished on the dusty rail
And I am weary of the sparrow's song.

Rising, by gaunt tree, indolent silk-weeds throng
Fragile, by rutted branches, lustre-frail:
This country's summer dwells too long.

Such thistle-game frivolities prolong
The torpid utterances of the quail,
And I am weary of the sparrow's song

Seeds pendulate forever, whisper-strong;
Unravell'd pods twist vacuous and stale:
This country's summer dwells too long

Let all the langorous wind-seeds breathe along Each lifeless petal-crumbled trail
How I am weary of the sparrow's song

Soon, soon, sharp winter with the stimulant flail;
This morpheic numbness snow-seeds will assail:
This country's summer dwells too long
And I am weary of the sparrow's song

I have the gout

By ART SILVER

I have the gout.

You may think it's pretty damn funny for a boy of 23 to have the gout, but I don't. It hurts.

I used to have elephantiasis, but I don't any more. Now I just have the gout. It's enough. It hurts. Mind you, the elephantiasis hurt too; don't ever think it didn't. But that's all gone now, and present aches are worse than past pains, so I just worry about this gout and don't have much trouble forgetting the elephantiasis.

I guess I should go to a doctor about this gout, but I'm kind of afraid to. It's kind of shameful to have the gout, isn't it? And if I show it to a doctor he's liable to say "shame shame" or other things like that which will embarrass me this gout hurts enough as it is without adding that sort of insult to injury.

Doctors always love doing that sort of thing you know. So do dentists. My dentist always says bad things to me because I suck my thumb. He always embarrasses me about that. It's got so I don't like going to see the dentist any more. The trouble is, my teeth hurt and if I don't go to see him they're liable to fall out. The last time I saw him he told me if I ever chewed gum again he'd have to pull my teeth out. Not all of them — just those two where he put that big filling in between them. Boy he had to work on that one for quite a while I can tell you that.

Twenty years ago my father had a toothache. My father's a funny old guy you know, kind of embarrassed about being an immigrant and always trying to show the world he's no greeny. Anyhow, twenty years ago he had this toothache, so he went to the dentist.

"Which tooth is it that hurts," asked the dentist, but my old man wasn't about to give any free information away like that so he just said "You're the dentist; you find it."

"Listen," said the dentist, "it's your tooth that hurts. Tell me where the tooth is and I'll fix it for you."

"Look," says my father. "I'm no greeny you know" (in his thick Polish accent). "I know what I'm paying you for. You're the one who went to college and studied dentistry. So you find the tooth and fix it."

Well the dentist couldn't argue forever. So he took a chance and pulled a tooth.

"Okay, was that the one?" "No," said my father, "with a certain air of triumph and satisfaction."

So the dentist pulled out another. Not it either. And another. Still not it.

It got so the dentist pulled out every one of my old man's teeth except the upper right far corner. That was twenty years ago. My father still has the same toothache, you know. Oh well, he must be used to it by now. They say when pain lasts for a long time and you start to get used to it it doesn't hurt as much.

I wonder if that'll happen with my gout.

I hope so.

It sure hurts now

(Eglinton Ave. West, 6:30 a.m., Sunday)

Four lanes of dark clean concrete stretching bare, reflecting the first haze of a morning sun. Air is fresh and damp; solitary whistle from the waterfront reaches north — deep and barely audible. Eglinton Ave. flows east in its broad, grey swath over a hill and beyond, one might imagine, even to Dorval, Montreal West, Westmount, — perhaps past Windsor Station. Peer's park, abundant, green in depth, turns slowly, grudgingly to the left at the pace of my desert boots. Trudging past her to the south.

Yonge St., the bus terminal, construction sites, dull carton office buildings approach step by step, silent, strange on Sunday morning. Pulse rings weakly in my ears; sticky, faint early morning feeling. There is never enough blood to go around at this time of day.

An old man wearing a crumpled, double-breasted navy blue suit steps across Duplex Ave., favoring his right leg. I pass him but he reaches Yonge in time for the 6:45 bus. Bus is crowded. Man beside me grips seat in front with long grey gnarled fingers; holds a cane between his knees. A girl in white stockings (no doubt a nurse dedicated to mankind) climbs on at the first stop. The pas-post at the rear exit, she lifts first one knee, shifting her weight and pointing her toe, then the other. Her head bent forward toward her thumbs that gently slide over the metal post before her, she is satisfied, passively enjoying the sleepy youth of her limbs.

The bus stops at College St. My foot is jarred sharply on the pavement. Yonge St. is old, shambled like a midway after the fair has closed. The sun is higher now and it pours a faintly golden hue on the tired structures, washing, cleansing perhaps forgiving them.

The neon of last night that sparkled through the dark is now at rest. So are the swirling, drunken, noisy, neurotic, happy, foolish, people that played here a few hours ago. And yet the sun rises. We are always forgiven for our evenings.

By JIM LAXER

In pursuit of the maraschino

The stopover

We drove all day, until the sun
Had driven splinters through my will
The asphalt wavered like a pond.
The woods were very still.

I parked the car, and said our city
Friends would understand.
Nonsense! But the katydids
Were calling saraband.

Across the pasture, midges danced
And tingled in the sun.
And as we overtook the woods
The fireflies had begun.

Windfall trilliums in the dusk,
And underfoot the twin green;
And from a pine the hermit thrush
Was rinsing twilight clean.

And on the path our shadows doubled
Bending, and they grew
More deeply shadowed where a stream
Went rustling out of view.

Who would know if someone came
To steal our city things?
Who will know? The silver moon
Is on the thrushes' wings.
Tomorrow I will speak of other things.

— Dennis Lee

Rolf watched the belly dancer swing her navel like a pendulum and glanced at the correct time above the bar.

"It's not so late," said Una. He ordered another round of drinks: scotch and soda for him whiskey sour for the lady. Una had her hands on the table skinning a toothpick. "Jesus, she got a high belly button," she conceded glancing up from her handiwork.

Rolf took a long sip from his fresh drink, washed it on his gums before swallowing. One of his grey hairy fingers came up to straighten his teeth. Una sighed and sipped her whiskey sour through a straw; the maraschino cherry bobbed restlessly somewhere in the deep.

"I can never get it the first time," she admitted, and plunged the two-pronged stirrer to the bottom of the glass. The cherry squirted to the top, danced on the surface between the floating ice, and disappeared again into the vast green waste.

"When you bend back, your navel stretches up," said Rolf.

"Yah? I gotta try that sometime." She slapped her throat with a smile and her bad teeth glinted under the stage light.

Rolf reached under the table to touch her knee and held the bony knob like a baseball; Una took another sip of her whiskey sour and made another try for the maraschino cherry. It went spinning to the bottom of the glass.

The belly dancer threw back the strands of her costume, like strips of paper-mache, and the muscles of her pink haunch rumbled to the drum. Rolf watched her thighs clean as a whistle, not a blue bruise anywhere. Una grinded the point of her knee into his palm.

"You gotta have good coordination," she said. She looked up at the dancer and watched the belly pump like troubled water. "If you got strong muscles down there you can do it," she said.

Rolf agreed and coaxed her knee back under her own chair. Her leg was prickly.

The cheese sandwiches came, neatly cut into four triangles, with a little cole slaw and a sliver of green pickle. Una carefully lifted one of the triangles between forefinger and thumb; she dropped it into the lower part of her mouth, and her jaw sank and swelled. A small amount of grease brought out the little hairs above her lip. They were not black, they were almost golden, and there were no more than five or six.

"If I did pushups for two 'three' weeks," Una announced, "I could do that same as her."

Rolf finished his drink all at once. He reached for a cheese triangle and at that moment the belly dancer turned her back to him. He followed grimly the deep cut of her spine down to the beginnings of a prominent cleavage.

"Clean as a whistle," he said sullenly and lobbed the cheese triangle down his mouth.

Una took a suck on the straw, making a funny noise where she ticked the ice. She put her long skinny fingers to her dark blonde hair and scratched. It was a hard

postquam exusta plaus, terraeque ardore dehiscunt exiliit in siccum, et flammantia lumina torquens saevit agris asperque siti atque exterritus aestu.

Wedlock was out of the question.
We walked along the marshy basin of the lake.
To where a ruined rowboat squatted in the mud.
Detritus of summer luxuries poisoned in a hurry—
We were stuporous with our heat. Dragonflies Sizzled on the glassy noontide, peacock blue.
They teemed above the mud-beached boat,
Dense with sound.
I caught a sunning snake and dared you kiss it;
In the 'National Geographic,' we'd just read
The python will engross a suckling foal.
Through a pollen-festered pool
We let the gilded garter slither off to live.
We thought that you were pregnant.
I kissed your neck. Your hair was black
And sherry in my mouth. Rank and close,
Were tensing for the deep caress, tightening
For the beast and finish, and we knew
The other knew it.
We stared into the pool, like a glottal eye.
I whispered, I'll push you in,
Like they did in Drieser's book.
Discord's blackened winesop sank into our reach.
You walked aside. Sullen and in love,
We waited for a fight.
You walked down to where the rowboat waited.
I stood beside you in a minute.
Your hand was moving up and down my back,
I was reaching for your hip.
I was tangled in Omphale's apron-strings,
I heard Aphrodite's golden girdle
Sigh southwards to your knees
The rowboat was a total loss:
Its hull was sodden,
Bleated out of shape, and gorged with silt sound, but is sounded comfortable too, so Rolfe wiggled his finger through the hole in his ear. His hearing popped and everything was sharper; he could even count the hairs of Una's moustache: there were exactly seven, counting the stillborn grain at the corner of her mouth. Her arm stood on its elbow with the blue prong poised in her hand; she waited for the surface to settle before poking at the maraschino cherry. Her arm was loose and fleshy, and her elbow was a tight orange and brown like petrified leather. She struck at the ice and parted the waters; a brief flash of red shone through the murky glass but she failed to spear it.

"I'll get it for you," said Rolfe.

"Naw. I get a kick doin it myself," said Una. She guffawed. "I mean gettin the cherry." She guffawed again. "In the drink."

Rolfe grinned quietly. Una grabbed him by the wrist and laughed in his face. She gasped for breath and her eyes sparkled; she leaned over her glass to stroke his cheek and he could see the great yellow crust of her cleavage. The belly dancer had tiny breasts, but their tips went upright like little dogs begging.

So you like to do it yourself, huh?" said Rolfe.

"Not me kiddo. Some things is yes and some things is no. I know some girls..." She shut up and put her hands down around her little beer belly, then gathered him up in a toothy grin.

Rolfe looked past her at the dancer; her name was Naomi and her legs were long. They were so long that he could follow the same muscle all the way up and see it wind and wink under the skin. Her arms were pink as shrimp under the light and her face was everything from gold to green to blue. Her armpits were smooth as smooth with not a nip of grizzle. That was something "Like a new born babe," said Rolfe; Una shuffled in her chair.

"I bet if I practiced," said Una, "for real..." She sucked up the last of the whiskey sour and the maraschino cherry lay naked at the bottom wedged between ice cubes. "Hmmm," she interrupted herself. "Gotcha now," and she pierced the cherry with the two prongs and raised it to the light.

Rolfe forced down another cheese triangle while the belly dancer came to her finale. She went to her knees before him and leaned far backwards so that her long dark hair caressed her rump. Her knees were shiny and thick and fanned out towards the clean thighs. Her breasts were flat but her navel churned quickly as if it had a motor in its pucker; it was a big one, like a small mouth closed tight.

"Hmmm," said Una, chewing the maraschino; she flicked her tongue out. It was blood red.

A reply from darkest Dixie

The blood-red sun sank seductively between the swollen hill's thighs as the trees arched and strained in the thick clinging heat. I curled on my balcony casually smoking while tiny trickles of sweat dripped from my boiling loins and sizzled on the hot tar below. I knew they would come for me. It was only a matter of time.

Soon, in the village below, I could see the flames of torches licking greedily at the sky. What had been a murmur kindled into an inferno as the eager villagers seethed up the hill towards my villa. They were in the court-yard now, swarming like flies about to devour a carcass. The moment had come. My body became an erection of anticipation.

"Come on down, you mangy pervert," a voice tore through the tepid air, "some of you boys try the gate, we'll get that filthy lecher."

Amid the howls of glee from below came the wrench of smashing timber and the clatter of pounding feet on the stairs. Searing hands grabbed at my flesh and thrust me roughly upwards.

The horde surged up the hillside in an orgy of jubilation. The pulsing rhythm of drums grew louder as they bore me to the cave. I crashed to the ground near the fire and the villagers formed a ring about my panting body. Suddenly a fearful howl rent the air and the drums ceased their sensuous beat.

Then in the mouth of the cave I saw him at last, his shaggy head swaying snakily, his razor-sharp claws raised in a gesture of hate. As he spoke, invective dripped from his jaws. The moment had come. I was fulfilled. The great welling hind subsided.

By P. O. MAUDE

He snarled, jackel-like, "you have given voluminous misinformation about traditional jazz. You have used sexual imagery in your column, perverted swine. You have spoken half-truths impressionistically. You have criticized Fletcher Henderson."

RUNNING ALONG

Yes, she said, the trees aren't any different than in the fall. They've got that old appearance of wisdom again, like a dark night. Then, after a short while, are you going out she said. To me it was like Sygne.

No, I said, no, I said. Well then you can sit by the fire.

Yes, I said. I can sit by the fire.

The light struggled in around that wonderful faded blind, and down onto the bed, the old sheets. I have always loved old sheets, old covers, unmade, worn away by time. I was lying, smoking, watching the smoke drift up to the ceiling. Westminster Abbey, I remembered, was as old and powerful as ever. Very old and Gothic, with arches in the second story like Notre Dame. It seemed to be made up of bits and pieces of chapels, quires, cloisters and only the ceiling gave unity to the stone and woodwork. The altar was done in velvet, red and gold, overwhelmingly beautiful. Everywhere age creeps in and gives meaning.

The man seemed nothing at all out of the ordinary. He had a quite ordinary nose and mouth, and had pushed his hair over to an extremity of his head. I turned to ask her for a sly opinion. Nothing, she said, I can't judge men objectively.

Later, I brought her to the small room I had on the fourth floor of the hotel I had found on the Rue Maubeuge. Her hair was loose and unwashed. Imagine the summer limping out, and the whole city becoming a glistening tear.

Note this, I read. If...

I sang into the small quadrangle. My voice faded. The sky bloomed, the flowers that you saw then... yes, they are here again. I suppose if you come back there might be some changes, but not too many. They've clipped the big trees at the far end of the park. But the fountains are still the same. Someone was asking about the boat again. I think, though, that it will remain a secret.

She wrote that the work was drawing her to a standstill. The life, she said, that I once imagined this could be has rather been overrated. Half my nights are spent plowing through inconsequential papers, and I rarely get to see pure sunlight except going to work in the morning. The view has not faded much, but I have had little time to let it linger in my mind. I promise to write again at the end of the week.

I thought I would wander on into the next room. It was done in this pseudo-American rococo, with a thin velvet cloth on the upper half of the walls. The paintings were strangely covered with glass, and the reflection from a skylight (strangely placed) made a horrid reflection. But a writer can say nothing about art. No, I said, you will not enjoy this at all. Athletes will find a hard time in the world. I acquiesce, he said.

...for my mother and father, both old in the heart,

With each castigation the yelps of the villagers grew louder. My head throbbed, salivation ceased and my heart pounded like a Buddy Rich solo. He continued invectively.

"You are trying to undermine modern jazz," he squealed, and you dare to say that Barnacle Bill, the Sailor was recorded by Hoagy Carmichael. "You fetidly deny the nebulosness of the term traditional jazz," he barked, sinking limply to the earth.

The mouth of the cave seemed to undulate. "String the dirty commie up," screeched the bongo player. "Kill. Kill. Kill," wailed the flutist.

The leader's eyes rolled in ecstasy. Droplets of foam gathered on his whiskers. His paws clawed the earth feverishly. "Bring forth the tuba," he shrieked, scratching his back against a tree, "we'll fix him good."

I swooned. The next thing I recall was a cool hand on my feverish brow. Mother.

"Wake up son," she cooed, "it was only a nightmare."

"Sure ma, I know, hey move over a bit, you're crowding me."

have seen many sunsets, many dreary days; they will find that you will get worn, an old worn thing. That is how they will see you. The lakes of Switzerland, and the green hills; I think they will no more honor you than country animals. Yet, you see...

The town was quite colorful: rich in reds and purple, blues sprinkled like daffodils, marketplaces. He sat for a long time, I thought, looking at the people passing. He would not single anyone out, but would eye all alike. I think I saw the makings of a quiet genius in him.

That again was a different time. If I remember correctly, it was just at dusk, and there was some sort of celebration going on. They wanted me to go down to the harbor with them and get the drinks off the boat, but I wanted to stay up in the bars. So we ended up by going over to someone's house — I can't remember whose — where things were alive. I doubt if they had an orchestra or anything: I remember popular music, so it must have been a record player. People would wander in and out, the bedrooms were full, the garden was spotted with people in the grass. Such a warm night. It lasted all night I guess. My mind is a bit foggy about things like that...

One morning I was up very early. I left her sleeping fitfully, and made my way toward the drop. I found him lying at the bottom of the steps. He smelt of liquor.

FUN ABOARD MUTLOW

The only thing Mr. Mutlow liked about the voyage was putting his watch ahead an hour every night to make the days shorter. Now the recreation director was leaning across the bar-room table again prodding him to play deck tennis.

"Everyone else is having a lovely time, Mr. Mutlow, you mustn't be a slacker. It's easy to play and so much fun! Fun is so important aboard ship, Mr. Mutlow. You can't sulk all day, you must mix with the other passengers. And it's such good exercise. Come come now, buck up man."

Mr. Mutlow, late of Toronto, sighed hopelessly cursed his Scots ancestry which had made him save a few devaluated Canadian dollars by choosing the sea route instead of air, and followed Miss Ferguson meekly to the aft-deck. Perhaps when she saw how incompetent he was, she would go away and let him drink himself into unconsciousness on the newly-discovered British beer.

Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kingsbury were playing quoits. They were two of the many aged and retired persons aboard on their way home to various parts of Britain to die after decades of honest toil in the colonies. Mr. Edwards had been singled out the previous night as the oldest person ever to travel on the steamship line and he had taken a brief but pleasingly ludicrous bow at dinner under the weight of his 94 years and 133 pounds ("strip-ped, of course") after an embarrassing scene in which Mr. Kingsbury had risen to his feet, claiming the age record.

Mr. Kingsbury had been righteously annoyed at Mr. Edwards for beating him by  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years but they later became close friends. ("By Gad, were you at Balaclava too? I don't remember seeing you.")

Mr. Mutlow watched in horror as arthritic joints creaked majestically. Bent over brilliantly, Mr. Edwards prepared to toss the quoit. Every nerve strained, every muscle bulged among the hardened veins. The plush liner held its sea-fermented breath. He lunged forward and the quoit landed squarely in the three-ring.

"Good—O Mr. Edwards," shrieked Miss Ferguson as she helped him to his feet and wiped teak-dust from his bruised nose and forehead. "See? I told you the tournament would be just the thing to tighten up those flabby joints." She propped him up wheezing against a mast and jabbed his waxen stomach with a pearly finger. "We'll have you in shape for the finals in no time."

By ALAN WALKER

He gasped doubts but Miss Ferguson had turned her attention to a new victim. Striding across the deck, leaving a swathe of disinfectant in her wake, she approached Mr. Mutlow who was trying to cower under a lifeboat. Nothing could save him.

"Fun is so important aboard Mutlow, Mr. Ship, don't you agree?"

They waited for Mrs. Prichard's 37-year-old maiden daughter to finish a killing set of deck tennis with a sneering junior second steward who was trying desperately not to laugh. Miss Prichard had taken literally the handbooks's advice on mid-day dress. Casual it suggested and casual she was. Her white shorts moaned protest as they tried to control the milk-toast-fed hips which murmured to and fro below a tongue-pink T-shirt painted casually on her bosoms. She pounced about, breasts lashing to all points of the ship's compass, as Captain Slocum remarked to his first officer that she seemed, as they say at sea, a bit broad in the beam.

The match ended mercifully before Miss Prichard's stroke. She dropped it in straight sets, 6-0, 6-0.

"Care to make it best-of-five?" asked the cruel crew member. Mr. Mutlow's quivering mouth- corners raised hopefully as Miss Prichard hesitated, afraid to quail before the rawhide flick of Miss Ferguson's eyes.

"Perhaps a game of chess," she stammered at last, and Mr. Mutlow's flicker of freedom failed. He knew his gym-shod feet would soon be dashing and prancing on the deck. Actually, he had less to fear than his fellow passengers. His 30-year-old unmarried body may have been dissolute but it was nearer health than those of the others who spent their days avoiding the avid recreation director—identified by a special armband that looked like ping-pong balls on a thread and by carefully organized and sensible shoes that made bottle-opening noises whenever their athletic cork soles came too near for comfort.

"Who'll take on our Mr. Mutlow?" asked Miss Ferguson, referring to her wiggling victim, as always, as the personal property of everybody else aboard.

Mr. Mutlow prayed for someone slow, but a junior electrician with the same sneer strode forward. As they faced each other across the net, Mr. Mutlow, in a flash of insight, imagined the line's personnel officer hiring the crew with: "Room, board, tips, a living wage and a hell of a lot of laughs, that suit you?"

The junior electrician elected to serve and suddenly with a flash of gold-braided blazer sleeve a rubber ring sped towards Mr. Mutlow, catching him on the chin and lower lip.

Montreal

Spiraling up wrought iron,
Old quarries' gold
Gleams silver
In the morning dew.

By day:
Squares fair with girls
On lunch, to shop,
Just walk,
Or take the air, the stares
Of those like me.

Long afternoons shadow
Rush-hour's beat,
As Roman tongues compete
With angled, Saxon shoes.

At night:
Mount curving stars,
Etched black filigree
'Round rolling streets of light Place Ville Marie.

— Bernard Katz

Engaged

Hi, said I
And rushed
With false bravado.

Congratulations
I believe, yes,
Are in order —
Congratulations,
Yes.

Somewhat demure,
On a chair.

But those eyes,
And then
That elfin grin;
All freckled up
For a pin.

Later,
I'll have time
To unravel myself Completely.

Now
The book's been closed.
My feet, tight.
Still caught Inside.

FUN ABOARD MUTLOW

When he came to, Miss Ferguson was standing over him with a cup of tea. "Bad luck, Mr. Mutlow, but that's only one point."

Surely, thought Mr. Mutlow, she did not intend him to continue. Cock-fighting had been banned in England, he thought, surely this slaughter must stop now. But she helped him to his feet and thrust the cup into his hand while the stricken junior electrician made clucking noises of sympathy over his head. The hot tea burned his throat and loosened the clotted blood that had settled on his split lip. It dripped peacefully onto his shorts. His head nodded and he was still.

Dear Miss Ferguson looked concerned for an instant.

"Are you asleep?" Mr. Mutlow slowly raised his head.

"I was in prayer."

Later that day, after the bingo, before the masquerade, Mr. Mutlow lay on his bunk thinking idly he might attend as a pirate. Captain Sebastien Mutlow, muscles rippling beneath oiled skin, wearing three flintlocks and an enormous cutlass, folded his arms as the prisoner was brought before him.

"Run up the swizzle stick, out the plank!"

Miss Ferguson, hands bound behind her back, chains dangling from both ankles dragging lead volleyballs, was placed before him.

"How do you plead?"

"But what is the charge, please sir?" she whimpered. "Never mind that, how do you plead?"

"Well . . . not guilty?"

"Ridiculous."

Captain Mutlow debated whether to keelhaul her before dinner or wait until the Welcome Dance. Visions of iron maidens and racks danced through his head as he lay on the churning bunk, ice pack to lip, lip to lip, grin ear to ear.

There was a knock and Mr. Mutlow's dream was rent from northwest to southeast at top speed of 22 knots.

"Hello in there?"

A small acrid voice from the bunk answered her: "Hello, Miss Ferguson."

"Glad to hear you're better, Mr. Mutlow. You'll want to rest a few minutes more, but I came to sign you up for polo in the morning. Ship is so important aboard Mutlow, you know, Mr. Fun."

Running along

and was badly bruised. He must have fallen all the way down the steps. His watch too was broken. I wondered if he would live, but that was a silly notion. No one dies from just falling down a few steps. Yet I hear that he wanted to die.

* * * *

I didn't get any letters from her for a long time, so I gave up. I couldn't go two hundred miles to see her. I didn't have that kind of money. So I had a new one in for a few days. She was very beautiful — dark skin and hair — and we would spend our afternoons at a lonely beach. I thought I might love her, but she was rather flighty. I tried to tell her of love but no, she said, we are just off for a fast trip that will end like everything else. Look at my eyes and mouth. Look darling, she said. Yes I said, this is just a fast one.

* * * *

Hold this, my father said. Get it up high I said, but not tangled in the wires. There's not enough wind he said. But here goes. I don't remember whether he got it up or not.

That is not the point. I remember this and it is no where in my memory. It hangs loosely in my mind. And now as I see you there, somehow you have made me think of my childhood. It is, I agree, a very pleasant feeling. I thought she would kiss me then but no, I thought...

* * * *

He used to try and sell me liquor. But I never wanted to get drunk so he would carry his ordinary face to another customer. I think she would smile when that happened.

Arabian magi

We started in the summer
To arrive there in the winter.
On the outer Roman reaches I remember
The colonial office where I was told,
The mind resorts to reason for want of training.
And in the desert I believed it.
I remember a fizzled fly
On a powdered sill. I watched the sunbeam Charged with galaxies of dust. There were not here
The lictors and the eagles — here rhetoric
Wore bandages and rags.
I will not try to tell you:
Hallucinating vacancies, singing bones,
Infinite regress. Camels swimming out there
On quirkless sands without a seam.
Dawn a forge-light, noon a limekiln,
Sunset like an oven.
Night like a ghost. I remember
The edge and eye of the pool.
Beside it, a cloud of gnats — later the white
Anatomy on the desert floor.
There was the hot and sucking wind,
The tents white and the lake red . . .
By day the melancholy flapping of their sail,
By night all that bravery of stars

The chain

I always feel at this time of year,
When the old year is losing ground fast,
That a long chain held tight in my grasp
Is slipping, slipping away.
Each link through my hands is torn, fast receding
Each tie with the past gone, lost, mine no more,
And ever new metal through my fingers rasping.
Tearing my flesh, strewing pieces of me
Dead in the past.
How long can I hold on this lacerous snake?
What if my hands, drawn raw to the bone
Lose power to hold, though myself still straining,
And slip, my nerves wet,
Yet numb now?
What if I lose this tight clench on the chain —
Where would I fall, with my red hands still reaching?

— Aris Slesers

Stems of Generation

They told me I was silly,
They drew comparisons with the lily.
The pansy being innocent yet
Luxuriates within her secret jet.
At night the poppy draws its curtains,
Resumes the fetal position.
A dandelion gone to seed
Is nudity indeed.
These old oaks know all there is to know;
Their roots are knotty, varicose.
The thistle is a milky weed;
I would not purchase thistle seed.

— J. C. Nohrberg

Mist:

A spectre swirling, slowly curling,
Twines its pallid fingers
In the foliage of dark willow trees,
And lingers, lingers...

In drowning desperation clings
To earth with cobweb breath,
Against the tug of fevered sun,
And fiery death.

MACARONI L

All day long I was boxing with my grandmother, who was an outstanding heavyweight in her time, and so quite understandably I felt very hungry when I got home in the evening. I did not have much time before the dance that I was to go to with my concubine would begin, and I still had to smear my hair with Cupino-cream (a tubed hair tonic consisting almost entirely of distilled porcupine fat extracted at a high temperature from the hind legpits of the already anaesthetised animal). My hair, which I wear on the long side, has a tendency to stick up resolutely and it is quite a feat to tame it each time, especially between my shoulder blades. Hastily I filled my suit pockets with cooked macaroni and poured some tomato juice after it. There is nothing worse than virgin macaroni.

The bus was jam-packed with Herringen and Damen and the jostling and bustling was almost unbearable. Having been squashed into an irritable mood, it took all the charm and sweetness of my concubine Cecilia to cheer me up again. As I haven't eaten anything since the previous night, my stomach was flatter than usual, and so I held her especially tight, pressing my firm and flat ripples against her soft and roundish bellycosity for

A serious song

Tell me what you want, my love.
A music for your ears.
A fieldful of sweet mountain tyme
Someone to dry your tears.

Ask me for my love, my life.
A love beyond our spheres
A love against November nights
Someone to dry your tears.

But what you want, I cannot give.
A child who has no fears
A man who is not bound by chains
Someone to dry your tears.

— Robert J. Taylor

To the Streets Paved in Gold

In immigrant hordes they come, hands calloused and worn;
their eyes reflecting hope;
Their hearts and roots from searing scarcity uplifted — bright 'kerchiefs, blank stores, Empty pockets in wide-cuffed, shiny, striped trousers with wet saliva crease.
The carboard suitcase with old-land tarnished treasure worth nothing but memory.

In awe,
they hail the smouldering soot of Montreal station;
the crisp winds of gray Malton.
Fear is no friend but pursues their peasant dreams built on New-World guile.
With careful tread, they walk the streets of glistening gold.
A strange, exotic world
In solitary room o'erlooking gaudy, glaring sights.

Foreign tongues bewilder the shrivelling group — close-knit — yet uncertain.
The first stride forward
Is rebuffed by greedy merchant, native-son — surly — incased by suspicion,
Who, in rasping roar of rage shouts loud:
"Back home, D.P.!"

Anger seeps through; overwhelms; tears come too —
Pride, old-land pride Wins out . . . No room for hate . . . too much rabid hate . . .
buried back there
In war-raped land, where children slept in rubble

Then a friendly touch or smile, an understanding glance makes endeared to them
The glistening streets . . . now paved in ebony black.

— Helena Turunen

some excitement. She was violently startled out of her dreams when I suddenly snorted angrily "Goddamn it! Some bastard picked my pocket on that miserable bus," and I held up my left hand red with sauce. She became quite indignant.

"What! Sardines in ketchup?" "No. Macaroni in tomato sauce, and I am famished too." "You are lucky, sugarplum," she whispered into my hungrily gaping ear in a voice so full of shyness and promise, that my blood curled violently in my veins, as the claws of a half-starved hawk when it beholds a fat sleeping elephant in the greenhouse. "Remember darling," she went on falteringly "I haven't given all my milk to the baby we adopted from the Provincial Zoo for Orphans and Foundlings."

She smiled and looked at me with her large and moist eyes: "Take it, if you like, but be careful." With trembling hands she undid her purse. It was brimming with milk! On top, a few greenbacks and artificial eyelashes floated.

After sipping out the milk via a straw that I stole from the soda fountain, my hunger ebbed and we danced closer than ever, with tightly shut eyes and broadly parted lips, until the band played "Canada, Canada, uber Alles".

(Because Lee Oswald's transfer from the Dallas jail was made in a manner calculated to facilitate television coverage, Jack Ruby was able to shoot him dead.

(Suppose television was not such a recent invention. Herewith my annual rewrite of the Christmas story:)

"CBS news presents a stark, factual documentary entitled No Room at the Inn—the shocking record of housing shortages in the state of Israel."

Good evening, my name is Walter Cronkite. In this unbiased, objective report on Communist infiltration and its unAmericanly noxious effects on the state of Israel, we focus first on a manger in the tiny village of Bethlehem. I'm talking to a citizen of Nazareth. We'll call him Joseph. Why have you come to Bethlehem, sir?"

"There went out a decree from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed."

"But why are you and your wife in this manger?"

"Well, we wired ahead for rooms but were told there was no room at the inn."

"Yes, ladies and gentlemen—no room at the inn. Now you've heard and seen for yourself the tragic effect of Communist infiltration into a young, struggling state. This man and his lovely wife Mary, who is momentarily expecting a child, have been forced to take refuge in this stinking sheep stable while the Communist lords grow fat in the luxurious Bethlehem Hilton."

"Now our camera crew for this unbiased documentary account will zoom in on this poor, exploited wretch's wife to catch all the thrilling drama of her last seconds of labor."

"Ma'am, if you can stifle your screams for a moment, how do you feel about having to bear this child in a grubby manger, crawling with lice and all manner of subversive germs?"

"Well, CBS viewers, I'm afraid she can't say anything as she lies there suffering the torments brought about by Communist agents. Let's swing in there and get a closeup of the birth . . . Yes, it's coming now and it's a boy and . . . there's something odd . . . here's a white light shining from his head . . . and . . . here's a bulletin just handed me . . . a demonstrator, presumably Communist, wearing white wings, has taken up a position outside the manger . . .

"He's carrying a placard reading: 'For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.' Other demonstrators have joined him claiming to be a 'multitude of the heavenly host.' Now we switch you to CBS correspondent Jack Martinstein in Jerusalem where King Herod is holding a press conference."

"Thank you, Walter. A reporter has just asked the king for comment and he is about to reply . . ."

"We are the king. There is no doubt of that. The Galileans are imposters when they claim their child is king. They'll be dealt with."

"How, your majesty? Reports indicate they intend to hide."

"I decline to answer that one".

"This is Jack Martinstein again ladies and gentlemen. Despite King Herod's refusal to answer, we can say that a source close to the king admits orders have been given for the slaying of all children under the age of two in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof."

"Now back to Bethlehem where Walter Cronkite is arguing with Joseph . . ."

" . . . don't want to badger you, all we want are facts. Observers here say you once suspected Mary of infidelity, but that being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, you were, as they quote you, 'minded to put her away privily.' What did you mean by that?"

"I want to cooperate but we have to go to Egypt, Mr. Cronkite. We have a lot of packing."

(But Joseph, this is in the public interest. The public has a right to see and hear everything. You must answer.)

"Mr. Cronkite, this is a matter of life and death. Herod's men . . ."

"Nonsense, you have a higher duty. (Bar that door.) Now, Joseph, the press has the right to report. Out with it or . . . ladies and gentlemen, here's a bulletin just handed me. Two armed soldiers are approaching the manger."

"This could be one of the most dramatic scenes ever shown on national television. Remember, viewers, you have CBS and modern communications to thank for all this."

"Now—everybody ready? Open the door!"

Charmaine and the Wizard

"Once, a long time ago, in a country that no one has heard of now, there lived a very wicked wizard. He was as powerful as he was wicked, and the people were much afraid of him, for he would cast terrible spells when he was just the tiniest bit annoyed.

"One day, as he was traveling past a certain village, he came upon a little girl playing by the side of the road with her doll. 'Ho, little girl,' he said, 'Why aren't you indoors with all the rest? Aren't you afraid of me?'

"But her doll interested her far more than any old wizard and she told him so, for she was a saucy little girl, and had not the least respect for grey hairs. This enraged the wizard, he being accustomed to having people quake and tremble at the merest sight of him.

"He made a terrible face at her, thinking that this would surely send her shrieking home. But the little girl, whose name by the way was Charmaine, the little girl only thought he was being funny, and laughed and laughed and held her dolly up to watch. Needless to say this made the wizard angrier than ever, and he tried really hard to frighten Charmaine. But it was no use, she only laughed the more at his gruesome faces and menacing antics. Finally he was too out of breath to continue, so he stopped, all puffing and panting, and purple with rage, and leaned up against a tree.

"Don't you know who I am?' He asked when he had regained breath enough to speak. 'I'm the wizard. I put hexes and vexations and warts and wens and all sorts of bad things on people, and everyone hides when they so much as hear that I'm about. And since you're so impolite I'm going to put a spell on you, so maybe you won't laugh so hard the next time we meet!'

By RANDY HOWARD

"So saying he began to dance around her, sprinkling powders from his pouch and chanting in a strange language. As he finished his incantation (for that's what it was) he gave a final hop and puff and was off down the road. Somewhat puzzled by all this, Charmaine picked up her doll, which she had dropped in the excitement. But then something strange happened — she no sooner touched the doll than it turned to dust in her hands. Blink and rub her eyes as she would, there remained nothing but a little pile of dust on the side of the road.

"She loved her doll very much, and was quite heartbroken at its disappearance, so she ran home in tears to be consoled by her mother. But, once again, as soon as she touched her mother the poor woman turned to dust and blew out the kitchen door. As this happened Charmaine began to realize that something was wrong. With her. When her father came in she was still crying. She tried to warn him but, wanting to comfort her, he put his arm around her and was turned to dust too.

"Thus orphaned, she was completely alone in the world, and would have perished but for the kindness and charity of the townsfolk.

Croc

Sadistic jaws lurk concealed in everglade green.

Greedy eyes — black-slitted, bedevilled, scrutinize

The brown river surface where it flows, in hope

For unsuspecting forest creatures.

It yawns — The yellow teeth stink of rotting flesh and slime.

It bellows for its cruising mate —

The jungle Echoes the roar in silence.

The croc waddles into the oozing mud, flicks

Its ridged and treacherous tail, snorts

And slides disappearing beneath the ripples.

A black, Menacing shadow moves under the watery trail swiftly

Towards the bathing doe with newborn fawn beneath her —

Greedily sucking.

The shadow grows, circles behind the pair — spurts

And wrenches the youth from his mother's side. An agonizing

Cry resounds throughout the river bank of mire The doe

Gone wild!

The shadow now grotesque in shape and deed — and with blood

Rising in crimson spirals to the air, Glides away... dies away... and is gone.

Charmaine and...

These good people were at first completely mystified by the disappearance of Charmaine's parents, for she was afraid to tell of her encounter on the road. But in time they came to blame the wizard, which was wise of them. Charmaine found, as she grew older, that the spell remained upon her and that whatever she loved would turn to dust at her lightest touch. She learned through sad experience to avoid most what she most loved, and grew to be a fair and charming maiden indeed, but a very lonely one. She spent a great deal of time walking in the forest, where the birds and animals would come to no harm through her affection for them.

"One day she wandered especially far from home, into a part of the forest where she had never been before. Tired from such a long walk, she lay down beneath a currant bush to rest, and in no time at all was fast asleep. Now this was the very part of the forest where the wicked wizard lived, and as it happened he and his gnome came by shortly after Charmaine had fallen asleep.

They stopped on the other side of the bush which was sheltering her, and began to talk.

"Gnome," said the wizard, "You know that once a year I must allow someone a wish or I will lose all my powers. Tomorrow is the day when this must be done, so I shall have to be away for awhile. I want you now to gather the ingredients for a changing potion, which we will prepare tonight, for I am going forth in the form of a travelling knight." The gnome grunted and scuttled off to do his master's bidding, while the wizard remained for a moment, talking to himself.

"Yes, since mine is such an unloved occupation I shall change myself into a handsome young knight-errant and grant the wish to the first maiden who kisses me. Indeed, I'll turn this necessity into a fine trick on someone!" With this he continued on his way, and after a little while Charmaine awoke.

"What a peculiar dream," she thought to herself, "I wonder what it can mean." Not realizing at all what had happened, she dismissed it from her mind and set about making her way home.

"The next afternoon, walking again, she happened onto a little glen in the wood not far from the village. And who should be there, sleeping by the brook, but a young and very handsome knight. Now this is not so surprising as it might sound, for the wizard spent a great deal of his time in the other world, and so he knew the minds of young maidens quite exactly. Thus he had learned that this glen was just the sort of place which was thought of in connection with dashing and handsome young strangers. He had made his way here to execute his design and so grant the necessary wish.

"Charmaine watched him for a minute. He didn't stir, so she moved to his side. She hadn't a thought for her dreams of the day before, but was entirely taken by the noble face and golden curls before her. Kneeling by his side, she was suddenly overwhelmed with loneliness and tender feelings for this glowing sleeper. Impulsively she bent and kissed the drowsing cheek. The wizard of course turned immediately into a wisp of dust, and Charmaine drew back, horrified at what she had done.

"Oh dear," she wept, "Oh dear, oh dear! That wicked wizard and his wicked wicked spell! I only wish I could turn him to dust!"

"But of course she had already done this, and so she wasted a perfectly good wish."

The analyst waited until he was sure she had finished.

"Well, Miss Cruikshank, you've certainly justified the projective technique. After all our difficulty with your inhibitions and protective loss of recall we seem to have broken right through to the mainstream of your subconscious."

"I can almost understand what the fairy tale means, doctor, but I'd feel better if you'd interpret it for me."

"It's really remarkable how you've responded to this medium. You should be three-quarters of the way to catharsis by the end of this session."

"I'm feeling better already, but please explain the story so I can be sure of what it means."

"Well, Charmaine is of course yourself. Her spell is your phobia — you are afraid of people and of marriage, these are forbidden by the spell. The powerful and evil wizard is an authority figure, probably a parent.

"As the result of an improper response to this authority figure, Charmaine became unable to approach anyone she loved. This suggests to me that as a child you were punished by parental love-withdrawal. Do you see? This affected you to the extent that you are now afraid to love anyone for fear that they too will retreat and 'turn to dust'.

"Now, the wizard-turned-knight. The authority figure changes person to become — your analyst. Me, Miss Cruikshank. You dreamed or overheard that your knight was really evil but that he would grant your wish. In other words, as your new father image I will help you to understand and defeat your phobia.

"Charmaine both destroys the wizard and loses her wish. You are still afraid that I will turn out not to be your friend, and that your problem won't be overcome. It's quite plain, really."

Miss Cruikshank had become more and more radiant. "Doctor, it's... you're right! It's all so clear now, about mummy and... oh, it's so wonderful! As though there's a whole new world waiting for me outside! I don't have to run anymore! I... oh, I'm so happy and grateful I could kiss... you. Oh dear! Oh dear, oh dear!"

On The Discovery of One Finch in Warbstow Wood

1. ARGUMENT

One finch is discovered by the poet in Warbstow Wood, not three and one-quarter furlongs from Smythe Hall, ancestral seat of the Winchelsea-Smythes and residence of the Hon. Mrs. Arabella Cowchest, B.A., patron of the arts.

2. INVOCATION OF THE MUSE

Of its latter-day might
And spirit contrite,
I dare thee to sing, O Muse.

3. CORPUS

As flows the regicidal stream
Past Memong's golden spire,
So trills the noble finchley theme
To Zephyr's sylvan lyre.

Brightest of all princely bards,
Son of Caedmon free,
That dauntest not the iron shards
That threaten saucily,

Sweet the song thou singest there,
Fair, thy golden plume,
O Wielder of the grandest air
That mortal dare assume.

4. REFRAIN

Therefore let our souls employ
At contemplating mirth and joy.

5. CONCLUSIO

Poor Alice

Let me tell the story of Alice McFeeter

A fair young maid,
Belle of Pleasant Village, none was sweeter,
Yet she joined the trade.

To look at life,
Became a mother and very near Became a wife.

(Quite large over the belly),
Launched on a path that spiraled down.
(The man's name is Kelly).

Took the life of her baby mild
With castor oil.
Stricken with grief for her missing child,
Too crazed to toil.

Joined a group of like young girls,
Grieving and poor.
Wore thick red rouge and dyed red curls,
The brand of the whore.

Kelly went upward in wealth and power
Got from his bride.
Met Alice only once for less than an hour
When both had died.

They passed on the staircase 'twixt heaven and hell.
He smiled like a clown,
Said the baby was lovely and looked quite well,
And continued down.

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

The evening passes. Everything and everybody is a punchline that is private and self-sustaining. Fitz beneath the table, Cheryl against the wall, Stephen U. at the window, Bobby E. Lee on the bed: they are a mosaic of spent people and their amusements are simple—a dream of hashish, the proper sense of waste, perhaps a convenient atrocity or two.

Someone opens a window. The sickly smell of hashish spins out into the air; a large hairless leg, at the apex of which a rectum sighs, straddles the sill and filters the breeze through its toes. Brynning the scot snorts while smoking. He has neglected to keep all the smoke in his lungs and fine nets of fume encircle his head like a halo. We wave much of the smoke into our own faces greedily and inhale at will. Happy and servile (is it not pleasant to have pleasant dreams?) our smiles increase as we fold like puppets. To my right, Anne The Pregnant, convex in a pose resurrectional, to my left, Rose the Newzealander red-faced and obscene. Everyone seems trapped in a perpetual stillness; we are disguised as vegetables, slowly sinking into that awesome moment of illusion and certainty; life escapes but details remain.

Homicz rolls a joint to round out the adventure. His eyes are so narrow they meet at the bridge of his nose and form one enormous bulb. His jaw is not hinged properly and shivers at the prospect of his decline. He has a small pipe cleaner which scoops out tobacco; his fingers are deceptively agile, such agile fingers are impossible to imagine, they have already deceived the rest of his hand. His tongue emerges to test the air; he purrs, a resonant happy "neeeeeeeem," and grain by grain he stuffs the hashish in. Details cumulate unnecessarily. A long red-nailed toe inquisitively thrusts itself into our plans. It has a single hair, looped like a streamer; its rind is composed of six segments, each one individually clean and white; it twitches conversationally, nicely cuticled, but a ball of dirt is lodged in its root. Homicz scoops it out, draws it to the light, pronounces it intact and stuffs it into the cigarette. "Neeeeeeem," then lights the sausage end and honks with glee.

Nora, brilliant red hair, has just returned from the toilet on the third floor and she is very wet. She has not mastered the art of the french toilet because she is too tired. Her eyes are green. She wears frayed jeans and the crotch is torn; the cuffs are ragged and the seat is stained with egg-yolk. She is not bright; her family is wealthy and lives in Grosvenor Square London. She is living with a seventeen year old albino who has pink eyes and hunts mice at night. The albino is at the party too; because the room is so small, it has been put out on the eavestrough. I can see it watching windows across the vast morning light. Nora has forgotten where she put it and is looking for it under a table and finds the west indian Fitz instead. She is too tired to notice the difference and runs away with him to Barcelona.

Meanwhile, from the eavestrough where it is perched, the albino spots a single garter strapped to a bedpost. The garter is blue, a not uncommon colour. So is the hand that plucks it. So is the leg which prods it up. But the albino is at a disadvantage. It cannot see the middle-right portion of the window and all life has now manoeuvred out of range. The albino is simple; it likes to watch things and it wears sunglasses when sleeping. It is young and petted and everyone's favourite. One day I will take it for walks along the quai with our backs always to the sun. It purrs, it grins, it peers into the air in search of objects. Buy it a beer and it goes to sleep, tell it a joke and it cries, draw it a picture and it eats the paper. It is a fine conversation piece and Nora has had it in her room for some time. When Nora leaves for Barcelona with Fitz (this will happen in ten minutes, I see them leaving as I lay on the floor with Rose), the albino is taken to a friend Daphne. Daphne hates men and locks the albino in a closet for two days. The albino does not die because it is too tired, but it talks a great deal, so Daphne who is very popular brings it out and feeds it pabulum. The albino likes pabulum but misses Nora and throws up out the window because it is too tired to swallow. Daphne is inquisitive; the albino appeals to her sense of hate. She rapes it, then buys it a hat.

These premonitions are too horrible to bear. I can't stand it and scream like a machine out of order; Rose tilts me. If I can get out of this everything will be alright, there is no pieces will fit; but I am trapped in a moment, there is no escape. Bats fly through windows, devils rise from no one's ashes, a noise like keening scurries from my throat. A trinity of fog, albino and silence. The punch-line comes to me and it is hilarious. Nora, the albino, Fitz under the table, legs, toes, garters. It is private and sustains me like an intravenous delight, but no one is laughing like myself

HARRY

They squeezed into a ragged old car and set off through the rain down dirt roads carved out of scrubby, stunted bush. After a long time spent skidding around corners and bumping along wagon ruts they arrived at the dilapidated farmhouse, lying bleached in the moonlight like dead bones left to rot in a field.

A dog barked mournfully from the woods as they staggered into the house and arranged themselves around the cluttered kitchen table. The farmer lifted a trap to the cellar, flash-light in hand, and after rummaging in the gloom returned with some bottles of dandelion wine to aid the conversation. After many drinks Harry became nauseous, and decided some fresh air might help.

The yard was ghostly in the autumn moonlight and the air snapped with a hint of frost as he stumbled along the side of the house and up the narrow lane. As he lurched along the rutted road he began to whistle. It was a nameless tune from somewhere in the past . . .

God, am I tired, he thought, just find someplace to lie down and rest. But he staggered on, almost as if he was being drawn by the darkness ahead. Soon he was in the woods, careening from one side of the road to the other. The moon looked red and the trees a spectral white, as the road pitched and shifted beneath his tired feet. Why the hell do I get so goddam drunk, he puzzled, too dangerous getting drunk like this. Never used to get so drunk as lately. He felt like flopping in the cool brown ditch. Then, just down the road, he saw a farmhouse.

He lengthened his staggering strides until he was opposite the building. A moonbeam fell through the trees and, after focussing several times, he saw that it was an abandoned house. He cautiously opened the rusty gate and sunk in a heap on the decaying steps. Just sleep he thought, can go to the city tomorrow. He crawled up the steps and in a last spastic burst of energy, fell against the sagging door. It gave under his weight and he kicked it shut as he curled up on the floor and slept.

Harry awoke, shook his head and peered about him. Through a broken window he could see flashes of lightning dancing about the top of a distant hill. Raindrops thudded on the thin roof and the wind shook the trees angrily like a dog shaking a rat. Fists of thunder smashed in the heavens like hob-nailed boots kicking down a door. God, thought Harry, glad I made it inside. Rain's coming in the window, better find a warmer room.

He stumbled across the room to a door and impatiently wrenched it open. Tripping over some unseen object he fell headlong. When he rose to a sitting position the room seemed to glow with a phosphorescent light and he noticed that the entire room was covered with red velvet.

Rubbing his eyes and trying to shake them into sobriety, he saw at the opposite end of the room what appeared to be a throne. On the throne sat a little man with short withered legs, holding a glass of wine and dressed in gray robes. His face looked as if it had been made from wax but held close to a fire causing the eyes to sag at the corners and run towards the misshapen hunk of putty which had obviously been meant for a nose. In the strange flickering light the face took on a decayed orange color ringed with tufts of long white hair that hung down shaggily from the thin round head. The ears looked as if they had fallen off and were hastily stuck on with glue.

But it was the expression on the face which startled Harry. It reminded him of something and at the same time, struck terror into his mind such as he had never felt before. Newspaper faces of sex criminals and murders, faces from horror movies, portraits of degenerates from museums all flashed through his mind as he gazed at that horrid leer. The old man was the most perfect conception of evil that Harry could possibly imagine.

Harry's eyes flashed to the door, calculating space and time, but the door was not there. Quickly he searched for a window. There were none. He began to feel sick. The lights dimmed. Outside the thunder seemed to grow stronger. The old man spoke.

"Hello Harry," he said. "I've been waiting for you."

Oh no, thought Harry, this has got to be a dream. His opening line is right out of a science fiction novel.

"No Harry, it's not a dream this time," chuckled the old man. "You've dreamt me too often, now I've come true."

"Don't give me any shit," said Harry. "If you're not a dream then you're the Devil and I don't believe in devils." The old man giggled wickedly. "Wouldn't it be simple if I was the devil. You could make a deal with me then. But you can't shake me that easily Harry."

"Well then who the hell are you?" Harry heard a quivering voice inquire.

"Oh come on Harry, don't be naive."

"I'll kill you, you sonofabitch," screamed Harry as he picked up a chair and lunged towards the throne. "I'll kill you, I'll kill you..."

The lightning froze the telephone wires in a portrait of coming winter as Harry wiped the rain out of his eyes and picked his bones up from the sagging veranda. "Jesus, what a dream" he mumbled to himself, just to make sure he was really awake.

He stumbled into the gray morning rain, soggy and tired, in search of the nearest highway. Got to get back to the city, he thought as he slopped along the soft sticky lane, feeling that someone in the house was watching. Afraid that the wind in the dishevelled maples was not wind but laughter. Afraid to turn around and look behind him and see an old man standing stiffly in the rain with the wind blowing his white hair like a tree in a gale.

When he finally reached the highway he felt better, reassured by the cars whizzing by, even if they weren't stopping for him. Then he saw the tell-tale flash of brake-lights and he knew he was city-bound. As he hopped into the car he looked furtively down the road. He thought he could see someone in the distance, trudging slowly towards the highway and the wind seemed to laugh in the trees.

After exchanging banalities with the driver of the car, Harry sank down in the seat to puzzle out the strange dream, or was it a dream? But he was sleepy and he couldn't remember how it had all begun. I was really plastered, he thought. I shouldn't drink so much. Must be a dream.

His eyes began to sneak shut in spite of his efforts to concentrate on the drab, damp farm-land whizzing by outside the car. When his eyes closed the wind changed to laughter and strange voices, the old man's voice. Harry started. I must stay awake, he thought. I must stay awake.

It became an ordeal. The telephone poles seemed to sway and leap at the car as it sped along the highway. The driver began to ask questions that seemed unreal and without relevance to anything, although Harry realized they were normal words that had become strangely meaningless. The muscles controlling his eyelids were giving up and his face was hot. When did I eat last? I can't remember. Was it yesterday? Can't remember ... when was yesterday ... how long ago ... what did he mean..... I know who he is..... must get home, gotta get home.....home.....

Harry tugged and groaned under the weight of the rope. Sweat poured down his forehead, steaming his glasses and sticking his suit to his crotch. His hands burned as he tugged and pulled his way through the darkness. What could be so heavy? He looked back. The rope stretched into the darkness and all he could make out was a large square object scraping along the floor. The room was tunnel-like. Where the hell am I, he thought. I've never seen this place before.

In the distance a light-bulb hung down from the high ceiling, glaring out in the half-light. Past the bulb the tunnel turned sharply. He dropped the rope and walked carefully towards the bulb. Better get out of here, he thought. Have a hell of a time, explaining this to anyone. He peeked around the corner.

The tunnel became smaller and as he groped a long way through the dust he had to stoop until he found himself down on his knees. Up ahead was another light. Goddam, he thought, this is my best suit too. Must have got drunk and crawled in here to sleep. He had reached the end. Pushing his head out carefully he saw a room that reminded him of the backstage area of a theatre. Partitions of some kind of wall-board led off in various directions.

He stood up and dusted the knees of his trousers. Light seemed to radiate from the base of the partitions and there was the faintest feeling of music somewhere. The light was soft and rich, just like theatre lights before the movie begins, a buzzing blue that makes the shape of objects dull and changing as you focus. Which way he wondered, feeling in his pockets for a coin.

All he could find was a scrap of paper, folded neatly. He opened it up. On the paper was typed: "If you wish to find salvation call Carl before it is too late. 366 Chedley Street, Apt. 5." He read it several times. Now who the hell could have put that in my pocket. Probably some religious nut or a queer. He refolded the paper, spun himself around three times and took the path facing him. He walked softly down the narrow aisle, noticing for the first time, the carpeting under his feet.

Soon he could hear music softly playing and as he hurried closer he realized that the music was a nursery rhyme. As he stopped to listen he realized that it was "Little Bo Peep," a childhood favorite of his. He began to hum it to himself softly and was so absorbed that before he knew it he had walked right into a large room. He stopped quickly, feeling strangely afraid of this place. He looked around. To his left a man in a white smock stood watching him.

Near the man a long white table gleamed under a large neon light which hung from the ceiling a few feet above. The nursery rhyme filled the room and hundreds of clocks ticked furiously from the pale blue walls. The floor was smooth red granite and the ceiling was so high that it was lost in the subdued lighting. Harry felt as if he had been in the room before. He was still trying to remember when the man spoke.

"Oh there you are. Did you bring it?" Harry almost screamed. It was him! The man in the smock was the same man he had seen in the farm-house. He wanted to run but the man was walking towards him and he couldn't move. "Don't go. I see you're not who I was expecting but come in anyway."

Harry eyed him suspiciously. Could it be that the man didn't recognize him? He felt a hand tighten on his arm and lead him closer to the table. "I must run" pounded in Harry's head. But he couldn't run. His feet wouldn't move. He tried to look down at them to see why they wouldn't run but he couldn't seem to bend his neck. He realized that his head wouldn't turn. And yet he was walking closer to the table.

"Let me see your face," said the man. "I believe I've seen you before, haven't I? Didn't you apply here last year. Yes, I remember you now. Let me get your application." The man moved towards the corner of the room and Harry could see him searching through a filing cabinet. "Oh yes, here it is," said the man as he pulled a folder from the cabinet and leered at Harry. "Why can't I run?" screamed his brain. He felt nauseous.

"I think we have an opening for you," said the man dryly, "but we weren't expecting you so soon. You must learn to make a proper appointment and come at the right time. We're very busy these days you know. I'll have to call Carl to assist me if we're to proceed with you now."

He walked from the room, his thick boots echoing sharply on the granite. Harry's brain screeched "now, now, now is your chance." The ticking of the clocks seemed to become louder and the music faster. His eyes blinked at the blue lights and the room appeared to grow larger and larger. The man returned with another whose face he could see but not recognize. They both held long knives and stalked towards him humming a nursery rhyme. Harry sweated. It ran into his mouth and eyes. He swallowed some and it tasted funny. Then he looked down at his clenched hands. They were covered with blood. Suddenly he was screaming and as the scream tore out of his throat and ricocheted around the room, the men plodded towards him, chuckling softly.

When he awoke he found the driver of the car staring at him. "You all right Mac?" he asked as he slowed the car down. "That must have been one hell of a dream." Harry realized his hands were clutching the dashboard. His face was covered with perspiration. He felt as if he was going mad. "Please," he said to the driver, "can I get out here, I don't feel so well." The car stopped and Harry climbed out feeling shaken and terrified. "Thanks for the ride," he said.

It had stopped raining but the wind was cold and Harry shivered as he climbed into the ditch and sat down on the wet grass. The air felt good. He sat there for a long time staring at the dew hanging from the dying blades of grass, seeing his past reflected in the drops.

"He remembered a scene from his childhood forgotten for many years. It was his parents' wedding anniversary and he was very young. He remembered wanting to buy them a present but he had no money. Suddenly he was living in the past. He had a friend named Bobby Alcott. Bobby had money he brought to school every day to buy war saving stamps. He had to get some of that money.

He remembered something else which he had forgotten. Bobby's brother with the huge head and blank, lifeless eyes who lay on a movable table all day long, never speaking or laughing. He could almost smell the pungent odor that hung about the Alcott house, it smelled so different than his parent's house. The smell made him want to be outside every time he smelt it, a sickly sweet odor that you could almost taste. It permeated every corner of the house, transforming it into a sombre, deathly laboratory.

Having persuaded Bobby to lend him two dollars he went uptown and bought an assortment of chocolate bars for his parents. He could almost recall the taste of the Spitfires, they were the best bars of all. The next day when his parents came home he hid behind the door and greeted them with a shower of chocolate bars. He hadn't even eaten one himself.

The reaction he got was not what he had expected. "Where did you get the money?" his mother demanded, as soon as she realized what had happened. "Did you steal it?" The carefully planned celebration was forgotten in the scene that followed. "I just don't understand you Harold." she said as he explained where the money came from. "We'll have to pay this all back, you understand" she said. "Don't you know we can't afford to have you throw away money like this? What's wrong with you, are you just naturally bad?"

Harry remembered the fearful flight up to his room. He couldn't understand. "I just wanted to give you a present," he sobbed over and over again as he lay in his gloomy room, unable to understand how he could get into so much trouble trying to do something like buy his parents a present. He thought it was a nice present.

Cars whizzed by on the highway as Harry sat in the ditch. Wonder why every time I look at grass or trees or sunsets I end up thinking about crap like that, he mused. Better get moving. And so he climbed out of the ditch and stuck out his thumb again.

He caught a ride with a salesman right to the city, being careful not to go to sleep. "Thanks for the ride," said

Harry as he shut the door and climbed onto the sidewalk. The street-lights welcomed him back by switching on like an eyes-right at an army inspection. He looked up at the oddly-colored city sky and wondered where to go. Too tired to go home, he thought. Might as well go to the pub and have a few beers. As he walked along the street staring wistfully into the store windows he was sure he could see the reflection of an old man in the crowd behind him. He walked faster.

He sat at a corner table and as soon as he got a beer began to think about the old man. Too tired, should go home and go to bed . . . better wait 'til the old lady's asleep... she oughta get married again so she'd have someone else to bitch at.

After five or six beers he forgot about the old man. A guy he knew named Freddy sat down at the table. "Where ya bin Har, haven't seen ya in a couple weeks."

"Oh I took a little trip down to Detroit, Harry replied. "Swingin town eh Har?"

Yeah, not bad. I got some friends there. Ran short of cash tho, had to hitch-hike back. Funny thing Freddy, one night I got hung up in this little town near London and the strangest thing happ . . . Harry stopped . . . the speaker in the ceiling near his table was playing an old song he knew . . . "James James Morrison Morrison Weatherby George Dupree, took good care of his mother though he was only three" . . . his heart tore at his chest and as he looked wildly around he saw reflected in the marble pillar a terrible wax-faced leer. It was him, staring, smirking at him from somewhere behind, in the crowd of evening drinkers.

He jumped to his feet, knocking a chair over and spilling a glass of beer, in his growing terror. He ran from the pub.

"Hey, where ya goin Har? What about London?"

In the street an ambulance screamed by as Harry burrowed through the late shopping crowd, fleeing the old man's face.

The living room light was on when he stumbled onto the porch and collapsed in front of the door. His lungs hurt so that he swore he could taste the blood but he felt safe at last. The door opened and his mother appeared in an old housecoat.

"Harold, what's wrong with you. Are you drunk again? You haven't been home for two weeks. Don't tell me you've been working. God knows a man your age ought to work instead of drinkin all the time. Where have you been?"

Harry could hardly talk. His eyes throbbed and his throat was dry from running and from fear. "Please Ma," he choked out, "don't start this all over, I'm not feelin so good. Can I have something to drink?"

"Well I haven't got any whiskey if that's what you mean. You're just like your old man, gonna drink yourself to death one of these days just like him. I don't understand you Harold. How can you be like him when you saw him sitting' in this house dying, killing' himself with whiskey. Ah come on in, I got some coffee on, it oughta be done by now, it's been cookin for about two weeks.

He dragged himself into the house and slumped down in the easy chair near the stove. His hand shook so he could hardly light a cigaret but he tried to hide it from his mother's scornful eyes. He felt tense again, like a hand grenade waiting for someone to pull the pin.

"What a pair of no-good men I got myself. When are you gonna learn Harold? I'm gettin old, can't afford to have you hangin' around if you don't pull your weight. My legs are gettin awful tired. Don't know how much longer I can stand workin' in that hash-house. Every time I have to walk all the way back to the kitchen to get an order I feel like layin' down on the floor and goin' to sleep. I bet you haven't eaten for days, I got part of roast. I'll make you a sandwich."

He couldn't pick up the coffee his mother brought so he drank a few gulps from where it sat on the table. He took off his shoes. The clock ticked so loudly he was afraid he would scream and he thought of his father, pale and thin, sitting in front of the T.V., drinking from a whiskey bottle. He remembered the fights and the cursing and screaming. The heat from the stove was making him dizzy. Furniture's so shabby he thought. Remember when it was new.

His mother seemed to be taking hours in the kitchen. The room swirled and revolved about him like a carnival ride. Nursery rhymes echoed through his head as the clock thundered out each second. He looked towards the kitchen again. There in the doorway was the old man smirking at him silently. Harry felt the vomit rise in his mouth and tensed as the old man glided towards him.

He was on his feet. He grabbed the heavy clock from the coffee table and hammered at the face. Blood spurted over his hands as he struck fiercely again and again. The old man sunk to the floor, a pulpy mess, and Harry smiled as he dropped the clock. There, he thought, you won't haunt me any more. He looked down in satisfaction at the hunk of flesh draining into the porous rug but it wasn't the old man at all, it was his mother.

She was quite dead. He rushed to the bathroom and furiously scrubbed his hands, tearing at them with his fingernails until the skin bled. "Ma . . . Ma . . . I didn't mean it . . . it was him I wanted to die not you" Tears streamed down his cheeks as he raised his head.

There in the mirror he saw the old man. And he was crying

fadeaway

It was an ordinary morning, a Monday morning that leads into a Monday on which innumerable things happen; though trivial to the community perhaps momentous to the individuals within. As any advance it gradually abandons its stragglers and gives its runners a boost. The rest receive a continuance. To the young the new day is but another opportunity for dreamed and redreamed windfalls, to the old a confirmation of long intimated catastrophes.

George awoke uneasily feeling somehow drained yet wide awake with strange realization, as a young lover awakes to find the presence of yesterday's love a mere physical discomfort. He expressed it in one word, an incredulous, "Shit," quietly to the ceiling.

Like everyone else on a Monday morning, George was supposed to go to work. Get up wash dress shave eat march. To work to live to work. The Big Bugle blows and is answered by a chorus of crowing cocks, bells, cannon, stuttering starters, chomping punch clocks, cash registers, and millions of mechanical crickets buzzing the curtain on dreams. A Jovial sergeant shouts, "Drop your cocks and grab your socks!" A pansy pats the canvas of a midway joint with, "It's that time again!" Drunks line up in bull pens to empty their little crappers. "No, darling, no, we don't have time."

George marched out the flapping door disgorging each to his own: the pious-for-a-meal, the soup addicts, and the waiters for unemployment, disability, compensation, baby bonus, welfare, pension, Irish Sweepstake, and pay cheques. Workers all.

He turned toward the government offices. As he walked he tried to think of something at work that could possibly happen during that day to attract him there right now, propel his legs into the purposeful strides he saw around him; something more than the endless movement of a clock hand, something that could stop it, even for a moment. Other mornings he'd thought of lunch with Betty, five o'clock, or Friday, but not this morning, this morning he couldn't. This morning he was aware of an infinite progression of lunches and five o'clocks and paydays; he felt he was walking up and down on a trampoline oddly conscious of all linear movement approaching him, passing, and fading behind him. His attention switched from object to object. He saw a grey paddy wagon trundling off to City Hall and wondered what the profile shadows within the mesh didn't do. Thou shalt not — I don't — Then you did. A sweet little ass wiggled by and he felt weary impotence.

George pushed through a door marked, "Department of Economics and Planning," paid the CNIB man a dime for a 29¢ chocolate bar, and became a junior inventory clerk in the employ of Her Majesty's Provincial Civil Service. He signed IN without wishing it were under OUT, or lingering for a second on the mystery between the IN and the OUT. If you come in, you go out, and if you go out, you must come in again.

"Good Morning," said Or-lon Hugged Falsies.

"Mornin."

"Good Morning," said Pin-chable Ass.

"Good Morning."

"Good Morning," swished Grabbable Legs.

"Hi."

George had worked there only a month.

fadeaway

He sat down at his desk and said, "Hi, Edith, how ya doin'?" to Buck Teeth sitting in front before she had a chance to droll her "Good Morning."

She turned to him nevertheless. "Did you hear the great newth," she said, lipping and slobbering. "Betty found an abtouthely fabulouth job and thee'th giving her noith today."

"Yeah?"

"Thee'th going to be a private thecretary for an ekthecutive hotel manager." Her moist eyes widened, "Ithn't that great?"

"Yeah, great." Spread your legs, Betty, sweetie.

"Oh I'm tho happy for her. That'th jutht what thee wanted."

"What she needs, alright."

Edith sighed and started checking figures, waving her head wistfully. Throughout the office George could hear exclamations of negative orgasms over Betty's luck. When she swept through the office holding her pretty head high and swinging her purse, nothing was said beyond the customary greetings, but she left more heads turned in her wake than usual. She gave George the lively young modern look-at-my-choppers wave from her desk. He sent back a limp hya, man salute. Edith beamed at him with her love-ith-tho-wonderful face of swept back eyelashes and beak nose; the romantic sensitivity of ugliness.

Mr. Scoles the boss hunched in with nods of recognition. After asking a few of the regulars whether they'd had a good weekend and having been assured that they'd had a simply wonderful weekend and that here it was Monday morning again, he did what he always did; laid the morning paper out on his desk; placed his fresh-bagged lunch in the right hand corner of the upper right hand drawer just beside the tea mug, hung his coat, wrapping the scarf around the neck of the hanger, slid out of his jacket, folded the shirt cuffs twice, hoisted his pants, looked about, and went off to the washroom with his head bowed as if to assure everyone that he really wasn't looking to see whether they were working or not. George got a few inventory card trays and by the time the boss came back, water shine on his hair and rubbing his pink hands, he was flipping through the cards. Scoles eased his office worker's pear ass into its receptacle and turned to the horoscope section of the paper, lying flat and neat in front of him.

As everyone settled down to work, time was forgotten since IN had just passed and OUT lurked somewhere ahead, but too far ahead to be fully savoured and appreciated, and the office became warm and comfortable, almost homey with mutual activity; a room full of congenial people working together. Chance eye encounters triggered the automatic twitch of the lips into smiles of some sort of vague acknowledgement. The girls who had been on a weekend shopping spree flirted between the water cooler and the washroom; men with 'heads' loosened their ties and rubbed their faces in proof of the weekend's wildness.

George decided to concentrate on his work. In previous weeks he'd had no trouble in completely immersing himself in the work, but occasionally he had felt uneasy and somehow guilty about the self-satisfaction and sense of well being and attainment this would give him at the end of the day, for what, he'd ask himself, had he really done? Just made the time go fast by substituting inventory items for thoughts; a sleep of broken record dreams minus rest.

I'm going to work hard and forget all this shit. He stared blankly at an inventory card. Forget what? What is there to forget? He looked up and right into Edith's face. It split and her lips curled and slowly peeled back, slipping on the yellow oral algae covering her teeth like slime. Forget what an ugly cow I got sitting in front of me. But he saw the anticipated hurt in her eyes, and smiled and lowered his head, blinking his own eyes to take the sting away as he realized her silent vigil in front of a mirror, at home in some bungalow in the northern wasteland of the city, after supper, on a Friday night, after her mother had asked her whether she was going anywhere, and he wanted to tell her that she's OK, that everything will turn out OK .... Shit.

Betty came by and gave him her closed-lip secrets-of-love smile.

"Hi, Betty," Edith said. "I like you new dreth."

Betty paused. "Hi! How was your weekend? I had a simply faa-abulous time. ... Oh, I like your hair."

Edith's hair was the same as always, but she was wearing a pink velveteen bow on her left side that balanced the pimples on her face. She blushed.

"Well toodloo, I'll be seeing you kids at lunch." She sailed off with her head high.

George focused on her seam-straining bottom. "Tood-loodloo!"

"Ithn't thee great?" Edith marvelled.

"Yeah, great."

"Thee'th got thuch, thuch, I gueth you'd call it thwa de vivre."

George went back to the inventory card. 500 cans, waste, tin, olive, for the purpose of waste. ... $1.50 ea. Now what the Christ does that mean? He examined the words curiously, as if for the first time, marvelling at the neat intricacies of the letters and the strange gurgle of sounds they combined to produce. The, the — what does 'the' mean? C'mon, fella, c'mon, you know what 'the' means. What? OK, 500. Five fingers on each hand, 100 X 5 = 500 fingers, cans, minutes. ... Jeezus, minutes again. Screw, 100 cans, waste, imitation walnut, for the purpose of waste. ... $2.50 ea. 10 receptacles, waste, walnut, executive, for the purpose of waste. ... $10.50 ea. 2 containers, waste, mahogany, matching, Queen Anne furled style, minister's office, for the purpose of waste. ... $52.25 ea. He was automatically checking the items against a physical count list.

He sat back and surveyed his work. There, now I'm getting somewhere. He read it over and yelped with laughter. Edith and Scoles looked up for the joke that was supposed to follow, but when it didn't come, she shrugged and went back to work. Scoles came up beside him, sucking on a pipe.

He chuckled lightly. "How's it coming, George," he asked.

"You having any problems?" he was always apologetic when speaking to subordinates about their work.

George realized he'd done nothing all morning. He picked up a random sheet of paper with numbers scribbled over it. "I'll say I am! Just take a look at this!" He thrust the sheet at him. "None of his stuff is on the physical count."

Scoles shook his head in dismay. "Well do the best you can, son. I know we haven't done our part here and that's why we hired you; to straighten the system out, once and for all." He gave the sheet back and cracked into a smile, pointing his pipe. "By the way, young fellow, I'm very pleased with your work and just between you and me, I'm recommending you for permanent staff."

fadeaway

Just between you and me, up yours.

Scoles flopped back on his cushion, seat foamate. ... $2.50 ea., tied to his chair, swivel, wood, with armrest. ... $37.50 ea., and knocked his ashes into the can, waste, imitation walnut, for the purpose of waste. ... $2.50 ea. Edith beamed at George over her desk, wood, 25 X 30, secretarial, with side drawers. ... $62.50 ea.

Big deal.

But walking home from work at the end of the day it feels great and back at the little seven dollar a week room after supper, yes, tomorrow will be a day.

No, George, today you may start throwing your waste into that can instead of this one.

Big fucking deal.

Can, receptacle, container. Flush, receive, contain. The minister's garbage is clean and doesn't stink. How many men on this, a Monday morning are silently happy as they smugly toss bits of paper into receptacles instead of Friday's cans and how many more keep tossing into cans so they may one day toss into receptacles? Containers?

Flashback, Blitzkrieg, 1949: At the end of a peasants' welcome a crewcut Prussian ramrod marches up to the village boozehound chewing the table cloth for the last few drops, clicks his heels, salutes, and asks where the washroom is. ....

The old peasant looks over his shoulder, "Washroom? What the hell d'ya want with a can?" he shouts. "This ain't Germany, y'know! We got freedom here! You can park your turds anywhere you want!" He gestures with both hands. "Anywhere at all! And if you like you can line 'em up and give 'em a right dress for all I care!"

He passes out and the kraut shoots him neatly between the eyes, craps straight-backed into his mouth, wipes himself with the peasant's beard, salutes, and marches off. ....

The contained. People are lined up throwing bits of paper into a container when a plump respectability at the side gets up on a platform, blows his nose, and shouts, "Ask not what kind of a garbage can your country will give you; ask what kind of a garbage can it is!" He looks about, smiles; cheers and applause come from the lines of people as he steps down and walks off with a brittle respectability clucking her leathery hands. The boxes are dumped and sifted three times by three front row wrestling fans and the plump respectability parks his chosen ass on a cushion, seat, Exelsior-foam with vents, pre-formed and leather upholstered, tied to a chair, executive, swivel, mahogany, with arm rests, Queen Anne furled style, with posteriorized back, in front of a desk, kidney, 7 X 12, mahogany, Queen Anne furled style, and sits wondering into which container, waste, mahogany, Queen Anne furled style, for the purpose of waste, to throw the Kleenex with his liquid pearl snot. While he is holding it a newspaper reporter takes a picture of it and a university professor analyzes it molecule by molecule.

George began working furiously. He spent the rest of the morning reversing the quantitative order of the entire inventory. Now, instead of 500 can and 2 receptacles, it read 2 cans and 500 receptacles, instead of 2 pens, Parker 61, gold embossed and 1000 pens, (continued on page 22) ballpoint, office, it read the reverse, etc.

Whenever he caught Scoles eye, he impatiently threw the same sheet of paper at him, and said, "Just take a look at this! Just take a look!" Scoles apologized profusely and bought him a coffee when the wagon came around.

By lunch he had finished and walked out.

In the CNIB lunchroom Edith sat nibbling at her chopped egg sandwich, saving two chairs.

Betty walked in. "Hi!" she said. "Where's George?" She sat down.

"I don't know. He left before me and he was in a hurry."

"Where could he possibly be? Today, too, when I've got so much to tell him about my new job and everything."

"Oh, he knows about that."

Betty's eyes widened. "Do you think maybe he's sad because I'm leaving the office?"

"No, he's very happy for you — he said that's just what you need."

"Oh."

"I think he's gone to get you a prethent or thomething."

"UUU, you really think so? Wonder what he'll get."

"Thure, you should see the way he looks at you."

Betty smiled and smoothed her thighs. "Wait till I tell you about the dress I'm getting."

They leaned toward each other and Edith was wondering whether maybe, just maybe, George would stay working across from her as she chewed Betty's peanut butter sandwich and, when she pushed it with her tongue into Betty's mouth, her pimples burst and sprouted small puss mushrooms. Betty licked at them when nobody was looking.

George was running down a narrow alley kicking empty garbage cans and listening to their rolling dying clatter behind him. As he rounded a corner a harness hog, looking like a recruited institutionalized hood, roared up on his motorbike.

"Hey, uh, whatcha think yer doin' there, fella?" he said.

George kept running. "The cans, the garbage cans are chasing me!" he yelled over his shoulder.

"Hey, wait a minute, mack, whatcha mean?"

"THEY'RE CHASING ME!" George shouted from half a block away.

The dick turned his pig eyes from George and squinted down the alley then back again and, making one of the quick decisions that these cretin brothers of campus football heroes are known for, roared after George who was now a block away and fading fast. In half a block his front wheel flew off through a shop window and he bounced a few yards like a pogo stick on his helmet and landed on the sidewalk. A clerk swept him off into a gutter and a snow blower sucked him in and sprayed the street-peoples' laughing faces with shreds of milk fed flesh.

George was stopped on the next street.

"Ya couldn't help a feller out wit a dime fer a bowl o' soup, can ya, sir?"

"Wouldn't fifteen cents for a draft be better?"

The bum swallowed, with the gurgle of a dry-flushed toilet.

"How about thirty cents for two drafts?"

Mouth unstuck, sour lint at the corners.

"Forty-five cents for three drafts even better, huh?"

Tongue wallowing like a worm in a rotting eyesocket.

"Ninety cents for six?"

Watered gruel saliva.

"Three bucks, how many's that, huh?"

Rasping of the final dubitable orgasm.

George gave him his last five and walked off. Back to tossed in the can for atabbing his wife (he wouldn't get married in the first place, and he wouldn't stab her, he'd shoot her) when he found her in bed with another guy (she wouldn't want it from anyone else in the first place) and kept getting remands for six months because she shackled up with his lawyer in the meantime (which wouldn't happen in the first place cause she wouldn't want it from no lawyer and anyway he don't need no ign'raunt lawyers) he'd get a hundred broads and — — out in front of her then french kiss her with a jack hammer and put his thumb in her — and his middle finger in her — and drag her face down over a subway grating, maudit.

but what's the difference between you and me? Eh? Why you're in the can and I'm not. That's the difference. You got nothing and I got me a nice little bungalow with a nice little garden and I'm received in my community. Why when I walk down the street, Joe — he's a doctor, lives just down the street from me — and Bob, he's got himself a little store, say a nice how-do and 'ip their hats to me.

"Mind you, it wasn't always like that. No sir. I wasn't always received like that. Why I used to be a regular hell-for-leather fella, one of the boys. Friday'd roll around and I'd be right in there puttin it down with the best of 'em. Sunday'd come around and I'd be in here. Yessir! Now this'll wasn't feelin no great pains, lemme tell you. So I said what the hell, why not? And we went off to that church jus down the street from here.

"Well, when we got there, there was a high and mighty fancy talker up there talkin away a mile a minute and I couldn't understand a word he was sayin so I just snoozed off and slept through the whole service. Then I wake up and it's all quiet and there's nobody there and that's when I heard the word of the Lord calling me. Yessir! the word of the Lord came to me and I went and fell on my knees in front of that altar and cried like a baby. Yeah! me! the rough fella! I cried like a baby, the poor sinner that I was.

"And I knew Jesus. And I knew that God loved everyone of us so much that he gave his only son and whosoever believes in him will not perish and will have everlasting life! It says so. Right here in the bible — the word of the Lord, amen. Read it sometimes. And that day the word of the Lord came to me and I'm here tellin you fellas about it cause it can come to you too if you want it and give yourself to Jesus and believe. And don't ask me how you'll know, cause when the word of the Lord comes, you'll know it's come, lemme tell you, you'll know.

"Now some of you here today might think that to be Christian means to let all the big shots and smoothies walk all over you. It's not so! Remember that lil garden of mine I was tellin you fellas about? Well I planted myself a couple little trees there a while back and I look out the window next mornin and there's the neighbour's little dog — he's got himself one of them elongated sausage dogs — liftin his leg and goin psst, psst, all over my tree. I didn't say nothin for a while, but the next day, sure enough, there he is again goin psst, psst. So what am I supposed to do? Let the little mutt psst psst all over my little tree and then the St. Bernard down the street come and chaw on it and finish it off jus on account of I'm a Christian and it says I'm supposed to love my neighbours? No sir! Not on your life it don't! Bein a Christian don't mean gettin stepped on. I jus phoned the Humane Society and they come over and took care of it.

"And you think the neighbours got mad? No sir! They understood — why they're regular people. So ya see, God helps those that help themselves. God plays a good game, but ya gotta play ball with Him. He pitches a hard ball, a fast ball, but it's a straight ball. You play ball with God and He'll play ball with you. Let's us pray.

After the prayer it's the cons' choice of hymns and naturally they pick "When the Saints Come Marching In," and sing for dear life with a negro pimp howling the refrains and a stud doing a soft toe on the platform.

the can with you, fella, it's getting cold out here.

The canned.

"Nuns, they're the best. I touched one fer seven car duckets 'n three skins."

"Ya don't need no nuns, fer crissake. Why jus yestidy I fast talked musta been a rich kid outa fiver. Whata blast! S'how I got back in."

In the corner of the long cell corridor a group is huddled discussing the peculiar performances of the outside while at the picnic table next to it amid squeals and giggles limp wrists toss cards for the night's choice of felahs:

"Oh you dirty old man!"

"Well really! Can't I even see what I'm bidding for?"

"Hands don't see."

After smoking the Hungarian tulip planter's tobacco in return for listening to him, Frenchie the smash and grab says that if he got

The Hungarian looks at his empty tobacco pouch and starts crying.

The corridor door is opened by the ex-Nazi guard and two men carrying a portable organ and platform come in. The plump one climbs onto the platform and the other one squeezes a few chords out of the organ.

"Jus cause I step up here with a bible stuck in my mitt, you guys think I'm some kinda queer? Eh? Do ya? Well I'll tell ya smuptin, I'm no queer and neither is my partner here. Now as ya'll can see, I'm gonna talk plain to you guys — I'm gonna pitch straight. I'm not one o' your fancy talkers with no high and mighty fancy degrees after my John Henry; I like plain talkers and I figger you do too.

"Like I said. I'm just a plain guy like anyone of you, shock you, comin from a man tottin a bible in his mitt, but I'm willin to give ya odds that I been in here more'n most of you. And some of the other stuff I done! My lord, it makes me shake jus to think on em!

"And you think I ever looked at a church? You bet your life I didn't! Eleven elephant couldn't drag me anywhere near no church, that's for queers, I said. Well I jus kept on goin like that and after a while I couldn't get me a job and the little woman started talkin bout leaving, and you know how they are, don't ya? You bet ya do!

"Well, one Sunday I'm sittin there havin a few drinks when the little woman and her sister come along and say, 'Sam, c'mon, we're goin to church!' By then I'd killed the bottle and

Poem

I want you for a statue in my backyard.
You will stand as everlasting as stone
Your eyes will always be bright
Your lips always there among the lilacs
The summer will come and you will be warm
You will be still as an angel
Just outside the drift of time.
Butterflies will be about you
Your graceful arms will live between season and song

You will look on the dancers in the street
Horses will look at you with surprised eyes
You will remain as everlasting as a poem
I see you stand as still as an angel and I want you for a statue in my backyard.

be received again, a bum shakes him by the hand and says, "I like a man that talks plain."

"That's me, buddy, I talk plain," he says and his pants fall down. (Striped shorts, natch.)

At the end of the corridor they see the Hungarian dangling by the belt from a pipe and a psychologist steadying him by the nose and stamping "Government Inspected" on the gaunt cheek.

George didn't go back to work that afternoon. He went into a tavern and sure enough, there was Squash, remover of axle bolts from cop motorbikes, buying rounds in celebration of his latest triumph.

"George!" he said. "Have a beer!"

George sat down.

"Ya shoulda seen im fel-las, ya shoulda seen im!" Squash was saying between gulps. "It warmed my heart." He carefully unfolded a piece of an old comic strip and spread it out on the table. They all huddled in and stared at the shred of flesh, already brown and shrivelled, lying across the gaudy comic colours like a dead leech.

"Masses are asses and turn to ashes," the Bible College flunky said.

Corby, a postgrad student of philosophy and Squash's theoretician, turned to George. "There is no right or wrong," he said. "Only different points of view."

"Yeah?"

"And what do you do, George?"

"I'm a rebel! I whisper fuck off at stop signs."

"Don't we all, don't we all," Corby said nodding his head and smiling wistfully. "Except Squash over there, of course."

"Masses are asses and turn to ashes."

"Nuther round!" Squash yelled.

"He does something about it; yes, he's a living philosophy."

"I hate cops," Squash said.

Corby nodded with the same smile. "Don't we all, don't we all. The principle of police, anyway."

A professing professor of literature (J.C. Krapnik) hits the headlines by suing a group of modern writers for devaluing the principles of his principal.)

"George," Corby said. "Are you going with Squash tonight to wreck the Famous Artists' Club?"

"What, the Pilot?"

"Yes, he is going to make it hot, so to speak, for all those followers of their one-eyed divining rods."

George shook his head.

"No? A rebel?"

"A fade-out. All real rebels realize sooner or later that complete fade-away is the only true rebellion."

"Masses are asses and turn to ashes."

When George left the tavern, Corby was exploring the philosophic implications of Squash's project to change the teathead are stobeknown-by its good taste alone sign to "Up Yours, with a puck, hockey," and Squash was trying to place a call to the President of the United States of America to ask him whether the spring of the Red Button is stiff enough to resist the weight of a fly.

George didn't go back to work at all. (A student was happy to correct the inventory for $5.) He lay in his bed for six months drumming hollow rhythms on his ribs till he faded away and was swept out with the fumigator's dust.

Edith and Betty and Scoles and everyone else still wait, especially on Monday mornings.

P.S. On a lonely road through a pastoral oasis a plump respectability out for his Sunday drive runs of gas. He knocks on a door and it swing open. Inside, a man stands on a gallows, and as he flees, the man shrieks, "Mr. Hangman!" and the slam of the door opens the chute. Organic cluck of a plucked eyeball.

THEATRE

THE FANTASTICKS continues right through into the New Year and is getting better all the time. This is the Toronto version of Broadway's longest running hit and was to have been produced at U of T this year. It's playing at the Central Library Theatre.

MR. SCROOGE, a musical adaption of Dickens, is the holiday fare at the Crest. Written by Torontonians, it stars Charles Wiggins and has a few showstopping tunes and some good new ideas.

At The Royal Alex, from Dec. 16 to 28, there is the Obrazov Russian Puppet Theatre. This is definitely not for children only; the company specializes in satire. If you missed them on the Ed Sullivan Show you can't afford to miss them here.

The O'Keefe Centre features the Ballet Folklorico of Mexico Dec. 17 to 21. Under the direction of Amalia Hernandez, this company presents various native dances and music from Mexico. Also shown will be several folk ballets composed by Senor Hernandez himself.

On Dec. 25, at the O'Keefe.

'GET DRESSED'

We're going out!

Compiled by VOLKMAR RICHTER

Dylan based on the life of Dylan Thomas will be presented. Knowing the exciting and unconventional life of Thomas, and the talents of Alec Guinness, the star, we have high hopes for this one. It continues until Jan. 11.

Starting Boxing Day, the Stables Theatre is featuring a family play Time for Christmas written and directed by Esme Crampton. It runs until Dec. 28 and again from Jan. 1 to 4. This company works at the Coach House Theatre at 146 Crescent Road.

Toronto Workshop Productions presents its first effort this year starting tonight. The play is Before Campaigne a new Canadian play about Joan of Arc. At its preview in November this play received excellent critical notices. The WP Studio Theatre is at 47 Fraser Ave.

Only two days left to see From A to B with Dorothy Parker while you sip your booze in the Theatre in the Dell. Barbara Chilcott and Anna Cameron are the main attractions in these five vignettes of New York society in the Boring Twenties. (The theatre will then be dark until January 22.)

Two days also for The Chinese Prime Minister at the Royal.

For the children and any elders that want to take them, the Questers Theatre imports a pantomime production of Jack and the Beanstalk for Dec. 13, 14, 19 and 20. The Museum children's theatre carries on with Sleeping Beauty and Wizard of Oz will play at Eaton Auditorium Dec. 27 and 28.

MOVIES

The annual Christmas specials for the yuletide crowds yield a very good crop this year.

Loew's theatres start things off on Dec. 16. Uptown plays Charade a comedy-thriller reminiscent of early Hitchcock efforts. Cary Grant and Audrey Hepburn are the stars.

Loew's (downtown) will play Kings of the Sun a huge costume epic about the Mayan civilization of Mexico. Yul Brynner and George Chakiris star.

On Dec. 20, there are exactly five important new movies coming.

The Carlton will run It's A Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad, World, the $9,000,000 Stanley Kramer epic starring just about every comedian around including Phil Silvers, Milton Berle, and Jimmy Durante. Jonathan Winters steals the show, in this modern version of the Sennet-type comedies. It's in Cinerama.

At the Tivoli, The Cardinal moves in, starring Tom Tryon (formerly Texas John Slaughter). Tom stars as a young American priest who lives and fights through World War I and II, Klu Klux Klan raids and much more to finally become the Cardinal.

At the Hollywood the attraction will be Take Her She's Mine based on the popular Broadway play. Sandra Dee stars as a young girl who goes away to college and James Stewart as her father who refuses to believe she's grown up. This is the movie that was recalled for editing to remove certain references to the Kennedys.

At the Imperial, former TV star Jerry Lewis appears in his latest farce, Who's Minding the Store. This time he turns a large department store upside-down and even has help from the manager. Basically it's the same type of movie ol' Jer has been making for the last eight years. It's geared to the younger set, like the two and three year olds.

At the Towne Cinema a delightful little picture called Conjugal Bed will play. This is a comedy about a young bride who will have a successor at any cost and like the Queen Bee drives her husband to the death in pursuit of that goal. Marina Vlady won the Best Actress award at Cannes for this performance.

Christmas day will see the start of seven new features.

About 12 Odeon Theatres will present Move Over Darling, Doris Day's latest comedy. Doris stars as a young wife believed dead in a plane crash, who returns six years later just as her husband is on his next honeymoon. This will also play at the Coronet theatre (the new name for the Savoy).

The Alhambra et al, will be showing Disney's cartoon treatment of the King Arthur Legend called Sword in the Stone.

The Eglinton will play All the Way Home with Robert Preston and Jean Simmons. This study in depth of a family of 1915 is based on the Pulitzer-prize novel A Death in the Family by James Agee.

At the Hyland, that popular fellow Tom Jones will make his appearance. Former angry young man Tony Richardson's latest effort, based on Henry Fielding's immensely comic novel, is a thoroughly enjoyable film and could be the best of its type ever made. Albert Finney stars as the young Tom. The film is filled with humor, fighting and sex done in a humorous way. It deals with those merry olde English times when maidens had to wear nine petticoats to protect their chastity.

The Downtown will present its usual fare of blood and gore cinema with such provocative titles as Goliath and the Sins of Babylon and Samson and the Slave Girl. On Jan. 1, that theatre and its 10 cohorts, will present a better-than-average feature for the science fiction enthusiasts. X, the Man with the X-ray Eyes stars Ray Milland.

The International presents Michelangelo Antonioni's L'Avventura a masterful study of love Italian-style. The story involves a missing heiress and her man's attempts to fill the emptiness in his life. This is the first picture in a trilogy. The second film La Notte was seen in Toronto in a hopelessly cut version.

The Third, Eclipse, will start at the New Yorker about Dec. 26. This one stars Alain Delon and Monica Vitti (who also starred in L'Avventura). This film won first prize at Cannes.

MUSIC

Massey Hall is presenting a fairly complete program for the year-end. On Dec. 14 is a TSO concert for students. Admission 75 cents. Dec. 17 and 18, the Messiah will be performed by the TSO and the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. Dec. 21 is TSO night again with Sir Ernest MacMillan conducting a Christmas Special. Dec. 27, Captain Kangaroo comes to Massey especially for the kiddies. Dec. 28, is this year's Atkinson Foundation concert with the TSO. Admission free. On Jan. 1, Freddy, the German movie and recording star will appear.

In the Edward Johnson Building, on Dec. 14, the Intermediate Conservatory Orchestra will play in the Concert Hall at 8:15. On the 18th, the Opera School will present operatic excerpts in the MacMillan Theatre at 8:15.

The Purple Onion will feature Malka and Josu until Dec. 22. These two have really hit it big after Mariposa and certainly deserve it.

Another fellow who's doing well after his success at Mariposa is Al Cromwell. He's appearing at the Establishment Dec. 18 to 22. The Fernwood Trio follows him Dec. 26 to 29.

The Colonial will present the Phoenix Singers through next week. This is one of the best folk groups anywhere. The trio broke away from the Belafonte Singers to try it on their own. After them, Buck Clayton's Dixieland Band comes.

The Friar's has its usual jazz line-up. Oscar Peterson will appear through next week. He'll be followed by Pat Scott for a week and the Lennie Tristano for two weeks.

The Village corner has a complete program for the season. Marc Strange and Juan Serrano are there now. Dec. 15 to 22 The Balladeers

Audrey Hepburn from "Charade"

will appear. They will be followed by Anna Perez (Dec. 16 to 21), John Smith (Dec. 23 to 28), Greg Winkfield (Dec. 29) and Barry Kornfeld (Dec. 30 to Jan 4). A good program indeed.

Unitarian Church, 175 St. Clair Ave. W. A chamber ensemble by the Musica Divina Singers. Sunday, Dec. 15 at 8:30 p.m. Student prices.

ART

Most art Galleries are featuring Christmas exhibitions specializing in pieces costing less than $100 for those wanting to give them as presents. The Roberts, the Upstairs, the Laing and the Tygesen Galleries are in that category.

The Pollock Gallery has its Young Collectors' Room for that purpose but will also continue its exhibition of Ceramic Sculpture by Hanni Rothchild.

The Isaacs Gallery again features its show of Japanese screen paintings.

Gallery Dresdnere presents a show by Ciry and painters of the school of Paris. Also shown will be a few pieces by Canadian artists.

The Morris Jerrold Gallery is showing drawings by Oscar Cohen.

And remember the Vincent Price collection at Simpson's.

Co-op gets credit charter: seeks college status

Campus Co-operative Residence Inc., the student co-operative at University of Toronto, is launching two schemes to greatly broaden the scope and powers of the group.

During December the co-op obtained a charter as the Campus Co-operative (Toronto) Credit Union which will enable it to accept funds on deposit as well as making loans to members.

They also intend to have a member of the Ontario Legislature introduce a bill chartering the Co-op as a residential college within the university.

To be called Rochdale College, it will be partially modelled after Massey College and will provide residence facilities and an administrative structure but will not undertake to teach any courses.

Howard Staats (III Law), president of the Co-op board of directors, said Sunday that there were three major purposes in seeking college status: closer liaison with and recognition by the university, raising of present high academic standards, and freedom from municipal property taxes.

He said the move had first been decided upon more than a year ago, but that it had taken this long to draw up plans.

The bill has been submitted to the clerk of the legislature, and after having been advertised in the Canada Gazette will be submitted as a private member's bill in six weeks to two months time.

Co-op officials hope that it will be passed later this spring to allow them to set up the organization of the college during the summer and begin operation in the fall.

If approved by a vote of the members, all present assets of the co-op would be transferred to the new college, and the present student-elected administration installed to run it.

The main activity of the college would centre around lectures and seminars on the principles of co-operative government. The lectures may be given by members of the university staff or members of the Co-operative Union of Ontario, while seminars would be conducted by senior students.

Co-op leaders say they would not plan to hire any academic staff in the foreseeable future.

The credit union has been in operation since the charter was received, but so far response by co-op members has been light.

Staats said that this is probably because at present the union does not have chequing privileges, but an effort is being made to obtain them, and it is expected that this will be accomplished within a few weeks.

At present the union has close to $7,000 on deposit, but it is expected that once chequing privileges are available this could rise to as much as $30,000.

During a full year of operation Staats estimated that a total of $40,000 might be received.

He also said that the making of loans to members had been possible under the co-operative set-up and would not be affected by the change, except that more funds would probably be available.

Membership in either the credit union or the college will be available to students on the same basis as for the present co-op.

Varsity photo editor Jan Czarnecki puts the Montreal Star Trophy to the use for which all good trophies are intended.

— VSP Barker

The Varsity won one trophy in the annual Canadian University Press competition conducted last term. Varsity photographers Jan Czarnecki, Tom Gallo and Terry Shaw combined to present the three news pictures judged best among those submitted by the 28 member papers of CUP.

The Montreal Star trophy for the pictures was accepted by Varsity editor Ken Drushka at the 27th annual CUP conference, held at Vancouver and Victoria during the Christmas holidays.

The Ubysey, the student newspaper of the University of British Columbia, won the two trophies offered for excellence in student journalism.

It was the second consecutive year that The Ubysey took the two trophies — the Southam trophy for general excellence among papers publishing at least twice a week, and the Bracken trophy for editorial excellence.

The judging of entries is done by noted Canadian journalists competent in their specific area of journalism. Four issues must be submitted, the issues coming between calendar dates selected by the national president of CUP. Varsity issues submitted were those of Nov. 6, 8, 11 and 13.

The winning pictures were Shaw's shot of students in an early morning peace march shrouded by fog on Parliament Hill; Gallo's shot of lovers among the leaves in Queen's Park (captioned "Pluck ye flowers while ye may"); and Czarnecki's action shot of a grimacing footballer missing a pass ("The interception").

The only other rating won by The Varsity was a third-place honor for sports coverage.

Government catches CUCND flat-footed

The Canadian government seems to have chosen the time for transporting its new nuclear weapons with the Combined Universities Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in mind.

"They caught us completely off guard," said Peter Boothroyd, University of Toronto CUCND executive secretary. He said many of the members were home for the holidays and the rest were unaware of the transfer.

The CUCND now is thinking of establishing a community education project in North Bay during the next summer, Boothroyd said.

This project would involve placing about 10 students in the northern community near one of the missile bases. They would concentrate on an education campaign among the persons living there, he explained.

"We feel this would be an answer to the establishment of the missile base," Boothroyd stated.

The CUCND is also planning to send a bus on a tour of Ontario as part of a public education program, Terry Adler, CUCND spokesman said.

The U of T organization is also cooperating with the Canadian Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in interviewing Toronto MPs and the preparation of a brief to be presented to the Canada defence committee.

Arrival of nuclear warheads for the North Bay Bomarc bases brought quick and quarrelsome comment from University of Toronto political scientist Dr. C. B. Macpherson, a director of the Canadian Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

He said the warheads made a miserable contrast to the federal government's New Year's message of peace and good will.

"The Canadian government would make a more substantial contribution to peace and defence by shutting down the Bomarc installations, and spending the money to reduce our stake in a nuclear armed world," Dr. Macpherson said in a statement released by the CCND.

He said the nuclear Bomarc were worse than useless for defence and increased Canada's dependency on the arms race.

He added that the thousands of Canadians whose livelihoods depend on armaments contracts "must be shown that steps towards world disarmament would not throw them out of jobs."

"Until this is done, Canadian moves toward a negotiated disarmament will be half-hearted."

Dr. Macpherson said the CCND was preparing a brief to present to the federal government.

Group Captain G. R. Truemner, AFC. CD*

Group Captain G. R. Truemner, AFC, CD of Ottawa Directorate of Personnel Manning at Air Force Headquarters, was born at Arthur, Ont., in 1920. A graduate of the Arthur High School he joined the RCAF in 1940.

G/C Truemner took his pilot training at Viridun and Dauphin, Manitoba. After receiving his wings, he became a flying instructor and during the Second World War served in instructional and supervisory capacities with flying schools at Hagersville-Kingston and Trenton, Ont. In 1946 he was transferred to RCAF Station Toronto where he was Chief Administrative Officer until his transfer in October, 1947 to the staff of the School of Service Management at Trenton, Ont.

After completing the RCAF Staff College in June, 1951, he remained as a member of the Directing Staff until September, 1954. During this period G/C Truemner also attended the USAF Air-Ground Operations School in North Carolina and the University of Western Ontario for a summer course in management.

Following his tour at Staff College G/C Truemner was appointed Officer Commanding, 1 Flying Training School at Centralia, Ont., a position he held until the fall of 1958 when he was posted to the National Defence College at Kingston.

Upon graduation from National Defence College G/C Truemner was transferred to Ottawa to assume his present position at AFHQ.

SAC ends year quietly

By DON SMITH
Varsity SAC Reporter

The expected fireworks did not materialize at the Students' Administrative Council meeting Dec. 12, and in contrast the meeting was marked by repeated battering against stone walls already worn smooth from previous encounters.

The issue of block sales of tickets for the two Winter Carnival shows Jan. 31 and Feb. 2 was disposed of quickly and quietly.

Diana Bennett, (III UC) withdrew her original motion that one-third to one-half of the centre sections be set aside for individual sales and the rest devoted to block sales.

Instead she offered a second motion, which was carried by council, that the seats be divided into two halves "of equal quality and quantity," one to be limited to individual sales up to a limit of four tickets and the other to block sales.

These restrictions will apply for three days of selling, after which any remaining seats will be sold on a first come, first served basis.

Then the council members apparently decided that they couldn't let the year end without flogging a few dead horses at least once more.

Model Parliament Chairman Ian Thopson (OCE) had to be ruled out of order when his report on the Model Parliament elections turned into an attack on The Varsity for giving insufficient publicity to the campaign.

"The Varsity refuses to discuss the issues on a Model Parliamentary basis," he said, "but when better to discuss them?"

"I know the Model Parliament is partly a game — but they're enjoying themselves."

Sean Cawley (SGS) sought without success to have the council or the student services commission, undertake a comprehensive survey of student living and eating conditions.

Richard Tan (III Meds) attempted to introduce a motion that the SAC take steps to have The Varsity comply with its contract, specifically in not printing such phrases as "Screw you, U of T".

No one seconded his motion.

In contrast to such proceedings a number of measures were whisked through with little or no debate. A motion was carried that "O Canada" be used as the national anthem at all SAC functions and urging its use at all other U of T functions.

Publications Commissioner Dave Beatty (III Trin) called the move "a measure of petty nationalism," while Council President Doug Ward (III Emm) suggested that the words be changed to "O Canada, our country evergreen, we don't believe God will save the Queen."

Also carried was a change in the Torontonsis contract providing for payment of one-third of the editor's salary upon "satisfactory delivery" of the graduates volume, and the remainder upon delivery of the activities volume.

A budget of $300 for the Canadian - Canadian Committee was approved, to cover present expenses as well as those outstanding from the March for Canada.

On request of the International Students' Council, the SAC voted to declare the week of Feb. 3-8 International Students' Week. The ISC and foreign students' clubs plan to present a week-long festival of international activities.

Then the council members wished themselves Merry Christmas and went home.

Calgary students strike

Calgary (CUP) The entire University of Alberta (Calgary) student body boycotted classes Dec. 20 in protest over the resignation of Principal Malcolm Taylor.

Dr. Taylor resigned his position at Calgary Dec. 18 and immediately was appointed President of the University of Victoria.

In a front page editorial Dec. 20, the Gauntlet, UAC's student paper, blamed Dr. Taylor's resignation on the lack of autonomy of the UAC campus. The Calgary institution is a subsidiary of the University of Alberta at Edmonton.

"Under Dr. Taylor's leadership UAC could have become one of the finest universities in Western Canada," the editorial stated. "It is not unreasonable to ask why we have lost such a man. One of the main reasons is surely the indifference and petty bureaucracy of the Board of Governors with which Dr. Taylor has had to contend. In leaving the University of Alberta, Dr. Taylor will escape the fat-bound complacency which insists that UAC is too small and too poor to run its own affairs. It is a fitting rebuke to this kind of thinking that Dr. Taylor will become president of a university no larger, no richer, but independent."

The University of Victoria has recently attained independence from the University of British Columbia.

Dr. Taylor was on the political economy staff at the University of Toronto and worked on the Ontario Hospital Service before going to Calgary.

Instead of attending classes about 350 students met in the foyer of the library to hear speeches on the need for autonomy for the Calgary university. A rally was later held in the cafeteria.

The UAC Students' Council has formed a special committee to advance the cause of autonomy for UAC.

In a statement to students Dr. Taylor said: "The decision to leave was the most difficult decision of my life, and I would not have left if there had not been important reasons."

R. L. Sanburn, editor of the Calgary Herald, said: "It (UAC) should be treated as an adult and allowed to grow as one. As long as the responsible authorities refuse full autonomy to UAC, this sort of dismaying blow is to be expected."

NEWS IN BRIEF

SAC needs architect

This is the last chance. No-one yet has been chosen as the architect for the mountain of ice to appear as the Ice Palace on the front campus.

Designs must be in the SAC office by 2:30 p.m., Tuesday.

Kidd named president

Bruce Kidd (III UC) was elected Ontario regional president of Canadian University Press at the December national conference.

Kidd will take up duties immediately, replacing Carleton University student Barb Sullivan, who resigned last month. He will take office officially in September.

The regional office serves to co-ordinate events within a province which are of chiefly provincial concern and consequently not stressed in the national news service of CUP.

An example of this can be seen in the March on Queen's Park last November. A provincial-wide coverage of the march would have encouraged editorial discussion on the motivations and effects of the march by students.

Kidd hopes to hold a regional workshop in September, when Ontario papers could take a collective look at the principles and techniques available for them to adopt.

New Russian scholar

Dr. Robert H. McNeal, for two years a member of the staff of McMaster University, will join the Department of History of U of T at the end of this academic year.

A noted scholar of Russian history, Dr. McNeal has written more than a dozen articles on this subject for historical journals as well as making a number of translations of recent Russian publications.

He will teach Russian history courses at Toronto as part of the new interdepartmental program in Russian and East European studies.

CUP needs more money to achieve recognition

The Canadian University Press would be known and respected by all Canadians, both in and outside universities, if it were not for one immovable hurdle. And that's known as money.

Limited funds available to most papers on Canadian campuses have limited the organization of CUP to basically one man: the national president. Otherwise, it's up to the member papers to keep CUP a meaningful word.

How well, for example, The Varsity has let its readers know of CUP is questionable. Most students can guess at the name behind the initials, while many others think Bruce Kidd's CUP Comment merely reflects upon his athletic-writer image.

And this is unfortunate, since The Varsity has a budget considerably more substantial than that of most provincial and private colleges. Many campus editors see salaries such as allotted Varsity editors as incredible — in fact if not in size.

And tight money on campus also tightens the role CUP can play in covering all the news of import on Canadian and foreign campuses, fast and in depth.

This situation was what prompted most of the important debate at December's national CUP conference in Vancouver.

National President Sid Black, paid a salary of $2,000, agreed that almost half his time is spent in what is best classified as clerical work. Most of this could be done by a full-time secretary, but the additional levy that would be put on member papers would be prohibitive.

Prohibition in this case has been calculated to cost each student on member campuses six cents a year. If member papers could extract nine cents a year from each student (the per capita levy now is 3½ cents), the president would not have to handle clerical work and rewrite stories from member papers mailed to him.

Realizing that money will not loosen up nationally over night, The Varsity and The Ryersonian initiated a motion to abolish the CUP news service (the system that gives the Varsity news of what's going on in other universities) as it existed in December.

Predictably, most papers thought this motion would bring the end to a national student system of communication. The motion intended chiefly to increase the scope of Mr. Black's job, and to give him more time to investigate news leads and consolidate national stories better than now is possible.

A sub-committee representing sectional viewpoints (from Ontario, Quebec, the West and the Atlantic provinces) weighed the situation till 3 a.m. one day, and came down with a compromise resolution that was passed unanimously in the general session.

The president remains with only part-time secretarial help in a position that has to keep tabs on news in a 4,000-mile-wide reading area. But he has been mandated to adhere to a priority schedule that has "in depth" stories near the top.

In other words, the news service (the backbone for many papers) has remained, while the editorial and reportorial powers of the president have been extended (if only by a recommendation to that effect from the members).

Canadian University Press potentially now will be able to beat services like the Canadian Press in getting the whole story on news breaks and university issues of vital concern. The former stress on rewriting one-event stories on one campus for the other member papers — often received by the members after it appeared in the national press — has become secondary in priority to bigger, less-isolated stories.

So it is hoped most Canadian students will soon be as aware of the power of a national student news service as are Americans and Europeans.

Parliament sitting delayed

Unlike their federal counterparts, campus politicians have few responsibilities of government to perform and can afford to take their time. And so Model Parliament, scheduled to convene this week, has been postponed for a lack of readiness.

Even before the Christmas break, several of the parties has complained a sitting this week would be too close to the beginning of term and asked for a postponement.

But it was only when federal House of Commons Speaker Alan McNaughton announced his inavailability for the original opening did UTDU Chairman Ian Thompson (OCE) feel free to set back the session.

According to Thompson, neither the Liberal government nor the opposition New Democratic Party were in a position to debate, and although the Conservatives and the Communists were prepared to sit if necessary, both parties preferred the delay.

Now the session is set for Jan. 20, 21, and 22 in the debates room of Hart House. No further attempts have been made to secure the Ontario Legislature for the Model Parliament sittings, since the provincial House plans to sit this month.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

With the exception of one or two dissenting voices the United States nuclear weapons arrived in Canada with the new year and met with no opposition.

The professional peace groups, who say they were caught off guard by the New Year's Eve transfer, did nothing to register their objections to the physical acquisition of the weapons.

This silence was unfortunate because the next day news reports throughout the country pointed out the lack of opposition. Within a few days newspaper editorials were proclaiming that because there were no demonstrations or protests it must mean that Canadians as a whole are willing to accept nuclear weapons.

But several editorial writers went farther to say now that we have the weapons it is the duty of every Canadian to accept the decision. They maintained that the issue is dead and is no longer a debatable point. This stand is as spurious as one as we have heard in a long time.

In the first place the fact that the Pearson government was elected after its mid-campaign switch to "honor our nuclear commitments" is no indication of the feelings of the Canadian public.

We saw the ridiculous posture of the Liberals who said, in effect: We're sorry but those dirty Tories have gone and committed us to accepting nuclear weapons and because we're honorable types we'll just have to accept them. But then the Tories came back to deny the commitment, and we never have seen any proof of such commitments.

However the Liberals, led by former Nobel Peace Prize winner Lester Pearson, forged ahead with the acquisition of the weapons, and last week the first shipments arrived in Canada.

The interesting and rather frightening point which arises here is why Pearson decided to accept the weapons. Obviously there has been a great deal of pressure exerted by certain segments of the Canadian military establishment and the U.S. government to persuade Canada to accept the nuclear devices.

The weapons which Canada has accepted so far are of a defensive nature, but it is obvious that there has been and will be great pressure for this country to accept offensive nuclear weapons.

Because past arguments and the recent defence committee reports indicate that the defensive weapons accepted are little more than useless, it is plain that Pearson's acceptance of the weapons is a compromise.

We do not expect the proponents of a full-scale nuclear establishment in Canada to relax now that a toe-hold has been gained. If anything, they will become more vociferous.

In view of this possibility it is absurd to insist that the nuclear issue now is a dead one; and it is ridiculous to tell Canadians they should quit debating the topic.

If the Canadian government is to refrain from taking a bigger step and acquire offensive weapons it will only be if Canadian citizens tell it not to. If we are ever to get rid of the nuclear weapons we now have it will only be because Canadian citizens insist that they be removed.

Whether the issue is debated on ethical or empirical grounds does not matter so much at this point. Whether we dislike nuclear weapons because we are now a prime target of offensive missiles, or because we believe them to be morally wrong is of secondary importance.

What is important is that Canadian citizens consider the issue as a live one and not as a fait accompli over which they have no control.

comment

By C. IAN LUMSDEN

What is wrong with Canadian university education? Obviously there is a lack of money, but this reply is becoming a rather unconvincing answer to a long debated question. It is raised in defence of almost every problem existing in Canada, which has the second highest average per capita income in the world.

The crisis facing Canadian universities is not one of providing the new and much publicized buildings, but of changing whole attitudes to education. The places and the money will surely follow when society understands the true nature of education, whether it be at the secondary or post-secondary level.

The emphasis in university education should be changed from the accumulation of facts to turning out graduates who are able and willing to think and to articulate, and to seek knowledge for themselves and not for their examiners.

This approach will require far more personal contact between teacher and student. If the increase in the teaching staff is not sufficient, the only solution to the teaching problem may be to make better use of graduate teaching assistants who should be trained by their departments to teach undergraduates. The course load for undergraduates is too heavy. It is pointless to force feed honors students with five or six courses, each of which may require one or two lengthy essays and considerable required reading in the short space of six months. Most students are exhausted by the physical effort of keeping up with this aspect of their work before turning to the real business of university education — self-education.

Their minds, instead of being liberated, become imprisoned by the confines of their course work. The result is a vicious circle whereby the graduates of this restrictive education become teachers at high school, and potential lecturers at university. They in turn teach their subjects as if in a vacuum with no relationship to other fields of knowledge.

I would suggest reducing the course load to three or four courses, plus one non-credit reading course given on an individual tutorial basis. The reading would be left to the decision of the tutor and student and might cover anything from National Review to the Peking Review, from Albert Camus to Rachel Carson, and, if you like, from Creighton on Macdonald to Newman on Diefenbaker. I see no reason why graduate students should not be used as tutors under the direction of a special faculty committee.

Residences, refectories, and student unions should all be considered as contributing to the educational process. A high proportion of students live at home and commute to university — it is seldom, if ever less than 50 per cent

Because of the much touted population explosion in the universities the concepts of university government and education are now in a state of rapid change.

The relationship of the academic communities with government and the relationship of the constituent bodies within the universities are being reviewed at many levels. This exami-

University of Montreal students march on T

By MICHEL BEAULIEU
The Varsity's Montreal correspondent

Last Dec. 11 students of the University of Montreal held a huge but quiet demonstration in front of downtown Trans-Canada Air Lines offices at the Place Ville-Marie across the street from Canadian National Railways buildings where they had held a strong protest against Donald Gordon a year and a day before.

The general feeling that day was that the snow storm that swirled across Montreal would definitely cripple the march. Another development was that the buses students had rented did not appear—as it was explained 'not to have any trouble with the cops'.

About 1,000 students showed up. (Some have estimated 2,000.)

They walked quietly around Place Ville-Marie's 40-storey main building for about an hour and then dispersed.

About 150 policemen were on hand. They had received strict orders not to intervene and mostly walked with the students. One of them was heard to say he would have liked to try his stick, but everything went on quietly and the only persons arrested were members of the Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance Nationale who had continued the protest after it was officially over.

During the march, student leaders from l'AGEUM (University of Montreal's student council) had talks with TCA's president, Gordon McGregor, about his recent declarations on French Canadians and the French fact in Canada, which were followed by a press conference.

It was thought by many that Montreal students wanted TCA to buy Sud-Aviation's Caravelle instead of Douglas's DC-9. That notion was favored by the DC-8F tragedy that took 118 lives in Sainte-Therese-de-Blainville just a week before. But as many people know, there are less fatal airplane accidents per capita than in any other means of transportation. And as intelligent people soon discovered, students never thou-

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

In view of the recent election results, I feel that it would be most beneficial to the proceedings of the Model Parliament if each of the major political parties were to contribute one of their seats to an independent who would not be bound in his vote by any of the party caucuses. If the party leaders are so willing such seats could be allocated by the Model Parliamentary Committee on request from various students.

I welcome any response on this matter.

Sincerely,

Michael Levine (111 UC)

In any event it is doubtful that five months as a filing clerk or dishwasher further one's education very much.

For many of us university education is the only opportunity we have to broaden our outlook and acquire new values. Take a look at the vast majority of university graduates whom you meet socially or in business. Do they look and sound as if they have been exposed to new ideas? Do they read different newspapers and periodicals, are they more discriminating in their tastes, is their conversation more stimulating, or do they merely hold more highly paid jobs, and are otherwise indistinguishable from non-university graduates?

I am very impressed by the number of Canadians who continue to take some form of night classes after they have graduated. Does this continuation of education make up for some of the earlier deficiencies of which I have been writing? The answer doubtful.
It is a healthy sign that so many people should be willing to continue studying in their leisure time, and all power to them. But once a certain stage has been reached the educated man should cease to think of himself as a formal student.
His lessons are over. Henceforth, the extension of his education in the broadest sense will depend more on his willingness and ability to teach himself than on what his lecturers may require him to learn. In this respect not many,
I think, turn from Time and Newsweek to the Nation and Canadian Forum, after having completed an extension course in current affairs.

did not want to spend thousands of dollars to have the company renamed; students replied that TCA's officials should have thought about it earlier.

After the discussions that followed TCA's choice of the Douglas' DC-9, the president said that TCA would not in the future consult the federal government on those matters. The students felt this was a denial of democracy.

Most of the Québécois are strongly nationalist and feel they are not given what they ought to get. After the Gordon protest, one French-Canadian was appointed as a director of the CNR. But Maurice Archer has worked most of his life using English, and thus speaks French with a very peculiar accent. TCA has no French-speaking director, and out of 18 high-ranking employees, only one is French. As French-Canadians are one-third of Canada's population, they feel they are denied certain rights.

Is Mr. McGregor competent? This was also much discussed. But it may seem by answering that question that we would be completely off topic. The real issue is mainly a question of rights given to Quebec by the BNA act. And if we keep it that way, Mr. McGregor should be dismissed for unconstitutional actions and declarations.

It is the only way to have things run smoothly again. But the Québécois are not hopeful for many past examples have shattered their confidence in equality in Canada.

What's doing in CHEMICALS?

Job opportunities in Alcan Chemical Operations are diversified. Alcan's extensive chemical operation processes several million tons per year of bauxite to produce refined alumina and also processes electrolyte materials for use in making aluminum metal. Chemical products include caustic soda, chlorine, aluminum sulphate, refined fluorspar, and pure alumina trihydrate as well as calcined alumina.

A graduate chemical engineer joining Alcan could be faced with almost every unit operation common to chemical industries whether he works as a process engineer, a development engineer or a design engineer. An Alcan chemical engineer will deal with fluid flow, heat transfer, crushing and grinding, evaporation, mixing and separation, crystallization, calcination and related processes. Graduate chemists will also find interesting careers in such fields as control, development and research.

Alcan's major chemical operations are located at:

- Arvida, Quebec: the photo at left shows part of a row of decomposer towers in the chlorine plant at Alcan's Arvida Works.
- Wakefield, Quebec.

Please sign for an appointment (Room 105, Galbraith Building), and meet Alcan representatives who will be on campus:

Varsity-SAC hockey till set for Winter Carnival

It was announced over the Christmas vacation that the big hockey clash between the students' Administrative Council and The Varsity will be held in Varsity Arena, Friday, Jan. 31, immediately following the Winter Carnival Ice Show.

Punch Kollins, general manager of the favored Varsity team, and Toe Cunningham, SAC g.m., signed the contract for the game last week at an official ceremony.

Announcements of the signings of players to both teams will be announced in The Varsity during this month.

Yvon Paquet leads puck scoring race

At the Christmas break in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League schedule, centre Yvon Paquet of Laval Rouge et Or leads the scoring race with seven points.

Paquet has scored three goals and added four assists in two games.

Marcellin Tremblay, also of Laval, leads in goals with five and is tied with John Savage and Bobby Apps of McMaster Marlin's for second place in points with six.

Debating group to hold interfac quiz tournament

Campus fighters alert.
Your time has come.

A university debating organization, controlled entirely by undergraduates, has finally been created.

The interfaculty quiz tournament will begin on Jan. 27 and last for six weeks, with three matches per week, taking place provisionally in University College, between 1 and 2 p.m.

Teams from almost every college and faculty will take part. To make position on the five-member teams, those trying out will have to pass a written quiz which will be given next week.

Point amassment is the final object of the competition. Ten point questions will be asked to team members. A correct answer means a chance at a twenty point bonus question.

Material for the questioners is culled from almost every source possible. Texts from most courses, the encyclopedia, the almanac, sports and current events represent some of the topics.

More information will be coming later on posters.

Gary Aitken may have won a job

By GORD BELLMORE

Santa Claus paid an early and unexpected visit to Varsity Hockey Blues this past Christmas — and the old boy's contribution paid big dividends at the Boston Invitational Christmas Tournament, Dec. 20 through 23.

The surprise was a talented new goaltender in the person of University College sophomore Gary Aitken. Aitken had been hiding in relative obscurity in the U of T Interfaculty League until he was called on to make the trip to the tournament.

Aitken wasn't enough to give Blues the tournament championship but in the two games he played, his netminding heroics earned him the rating of All-Tournament goalie.

Blues won these two games, 6-1 over Northeastern and 9-1 over Boston College, but saw their hopes for a sweep ruined by losing in their second game to Harvard, 4-1. Harvard won the tournament title with three wins in three games.

Aitken, a former Junior "A" goalie with Peterborough, had tried for a place with Blues early in the season but left after a few practices. He joined UC in the Interfaculty League and was the main reason why UC was undefeated by the Christmas break.

Varsity coach Joe Kane called on Aitken at the last moment to back up regular netminder Larry Soden on the Boston trip. Aitken played in the tournament opener against Northeastern and responded with the top goaltending effort of the whole tournament.

He kicked out 39 shots in Blues' 6-1 win compared to 27 saves made by the Northeastern netminder. Aitken was especially prominent in the first period when Blues ran into a host of penalties, mainly because they were unfamiliar with the international playing rules that governed the tournament.

Aitken stopped only 16 shots in the 9-1 win over Boston College but played another strong game. His one-goal against-per-age average earned him the all-star spot.

Aitken's performance may also have earned him the regular goaltending position with Blues for the rest of the Senior Intercollegiate League season. Kane indicated that Aitken will be in the nets when Blues play host to Queen's Golden Gaels Friday night and will hold the position until he shows he can't handle it.

Blues' big forward line of Steve Monteith, Sonny Osborne and Ward Passi was also a big hit at the tournament and Passi was named All-Tournament left winger from the six teams participating.

The "Mop Line" hit its stride in the win over Boston College by scoring seven of Blues' nine goals. Monteith netted four and Passi scored two and added four assists.

Stray Shots: Harvard goalie Bill Sweitzer was the difference in the game that won the title. Varsity's Larry Soden had an off-night. . . . Prior to the Boston junket, Blues split an exhibition series with Michigan at Ann Arbor, winning 5-3 and losing 10-0. . . .

Utility man Jerry Marlborough has left Blues and U of T to take a teaching job. . . . McMaster Marlin's lead the senior circuit with two victories. Blues have a win and a tie for second. Marlin's have scored 15 goals in their two league games.

Varsity vacation sports briefs

University of Toronto Swim Blues swamped Western in a dual pool meet at London shortly before the vacation. Blues' victory was overwhelming as Western could only manage two slim wins in a dozen competitions.

Double victors for Blues were Iron Man Tom Verth, who splashed to easy 200-yard and 500-yard freestyle wins, and Mike Chapelle, who handily captured the individual medley and the breaststroke.

Pete Richardson topped off his 100-yard freestyle win with a brilliant come-from-behind anchor leg in the medley relay, while Bob Smagala was all alone in the diving competition.

Blues left their backstroker in Toronto, and co-coach John Ridpath was pressed into service. He placed a strong second.

Varsity's middle-distance ace Bruce Kidd romped to an 8:54 indoor two-mile win in a holiday track meet in San Francisco. In the same meet, U of T alumnus Bill Crothers distinguished himself by lowering the US indoor record for 880 yards. Crothers' clocking of 1:50.2 was 1/10th of a second better than the mark set in 1957 by Arnie Sowell. The regular boards season gets under way this weekend with the Knights of Columbus meeting in Boston.

Fencing Coach Imre Hennyey's proud squad fought to its third consecutive triumph in as many tournaments by embarrassing Hobart College 19-8 in a dual meet at Hart House shortly before Christmas.

Outstanding for Blues was Helmut Microys who triumphed in all six of his bouts. Microys received strong support from Nansing Ho, Tony Advokaat, and Vladimir Hatchinski.

Blues will attempt to make it four wins in a row Saturday at Hart House when they play host to Rochester Institute of Technology. Last fall, Blues downed RIT 17-10.

University of Toronto PHE freshman Pete Burwash was among the early eliminations in the 17th annual Orange Bowl junior tennis championships held in Miami Beach over the holidays.

Burwash fell before Pat Homberger of Belgium, 6-4, 4-6, and 6-0. There were 93 entrants in the starstudded tournament.

1963 INTERFACULTY REVIEW

Irish close year with lacrosse title

By AL SCHOENBORN
Interfac Editor

Although the interfaculty sports year is only half over, it might be interesting to review the championship teams of the calendar year 1963.

The most recent champion was St. Michael's A lacrosse team, which won the Dafeo Cup just prior to the Christmas break by edging PHE A in the final series, two games to one.

The Double Blue squeezed out a close, but well-earned, 6-5 triumph in the final game of the series. Special mention should be made of the two goaltenders in the series, Larry Soden of St. Mike's and Larry Nancekivell, who starred for the losing PHE squad.

George Olah proved the most valuable player in the series. Olah was a single-handed stone wall on the SMC defence while leading his team offensively with 10 goals in the series.

As usual, Don Arthurs of PHE was the outstanding scorer on the floor, netting 13 of his team's 23 goals.

Hockey (Jennings Cup) — Vic I successfully defended its title against Sr. SPS. Victoria IV was intermediate league champion.

Basketball (Sifton Cup) — St. Mike's A won over Sr. SPS.

Minor League Basketball (STO Civils Trophy) — Vic Spastics, led by ace financial wizard Larry Ward, took this title.

Squash (Boake Trophy) — Trinity A defeated Meds A.

Water Polo (Eckhardt Cup) — Meds Third Year retained supremacy by defeating PH E.

Track (Rowell Memorial Cup) — University College

SONNY OSBORNE
Artful Playmaker

won the interfaculty meet while PHE took the novice title.

Indoor Track (Toronto Cricket Club Cup) — Victoria College was the winner.

Rugger — PHE A ended the long reign of Vic I by upsetting the Scarlet and Gold in the final, 8-0. Wycliffe also pulled an upset over undefeated Law to take the Division II crown.

Soccer (Arts Faculty Cup) — Sr. SPS defended its title successfully against UC I. Architecture made it three in a row in Division II with an upset over Law.

Football (Mulock Cup) — This ancient mug continues to gather dust at Victoria College where it has been cooped up for six years. St. Mike's was the victim in the final game for the second year in a row.

Volleyball (Victoria Staff Cup) — The title remains in the little red skulehouse as Sr. SPS defeated Jr. SPS in the final series.

HOCKEY

With the present schedule approaching the half-way mark, three teams are leading in the hunt for the Jennings Cup.

The surprising UC Redmen, led by ace goalie Gary Aitken who has since joined Varsity Blues, lead Group I with four wins without a defeat. Vic I also has eight points but has lost one game. St. Mike's A continues to improve and is a definite contender with six points.

BASKETBALL

Group I basketball promises an interesting race as all four teams appear to be capable of beating each other. In recent games this fact has become evident as St. Mike's A (1-2) handed UC I its first defeat after three straight wins and Sr. SPS (0-3) hit the win column against PHE I (2-1). This leaves the following situation in Group I:

	P	W	L	T	Pts
UC I	4	3	1	0	6
PHE I	4	2	2	0	4
St. Mike's A	4	2	2	0	4
Sr. SPS	4	1	3	0	2

CAGERS MAY SEE SOME CHANGES

"Cactus Jack" concerned about lack of scoring depth

Varsity basketball coach John McManus gave his Blues the pleasure of a holiday vacation free of any exhibition games. But that doesn't mean "Cactus Jack" is thoroughly pleased with his team's performance in games so far this season.

In all Blues' exhibition games and one Senior Intercollegiate League game, veterans Dave West and Ed Bordas have carried the scoring load.

"Bordas and West have been playing well," commented McManus after returning from a vacation in sunny Florida, "but our other forwards haven't been scoring. We may have to make some changes in the lineup in the future."

Blues' regular lineup in games so far has had Bordas, John O'Neill and Dave Ouchterlony handling most of the forward work. But Ouchterlony and O'Neill, both veterans, haven't yet showed the form that made them important assets to the team the past few seasons.

McManus suggested that if things don't look up, he may sacrifice a forward for an extra outside shooter. Veteran Doug McKenzie and rookie Vlad Baranowicz give Blues extra outside strength behind West and Bill Woloshyn, who has been impressive since joining Blues this season from Western Mustangs.

"We might have to go with three outside shooters," said McManus. "But this can be dangerous if your shooters have a bad game since there would be only one man playing the boards."

Blues' lack of overall scoring power was in evidence when they dropped their last two games before the holiday break. Bordas and West each ran up high scoring totals in the games at Buffalo State and Rochester University but lack of support cost Blues the two games.

McManus will have some time to work on his strategy before the intercollegiate league schedule resumes for Blues. Varsity has three exhibition games in the next nine days before meeting Windsor Lancers, defending champs, at Hart House Friday, Jan. 17.

Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks play at Hart House Wednesday night and highly-

DAVE WEST
Carrying the bulk rated Florida Southern University is here for a big exhibition game Saturday night. Blues play at University of Buffalo one week from Wednesday.

Under The Basket—Blues have won their only league game, defeating McGill 99-56, and are tied with Windsor for first place. Lancers trumped McMaster 102-72 in the only other league game played so far. . . . McManus learned nothing about Florida Southern while down south, except that their team has a 7-0 record this season. . . . McManus ran into former Varsity hockey and football player Barry (The Baron) Rowland, who was also vacationing in Florida. He also met Varsity swimmers John Ridpath, Tom Verth, and Graeme Barber, who were attending a swimming clinic at Fort Lauderdale.

THE Varsity

TORONTO

VOL. 83 — No. 36 — Jan. 8th, 1964

Reaction among university staff to Campus Co-operative's for application for college status is mixed.

Opinions of the Co-op's plans as outlined in Monday's Varsity ranged from broad approval voiced by Professor C. B. Macpherson of the department of political economy to opposition expressed by university Academic Vice-President Moffat Woodside.

"I think the Co-op's idea is very sensible," Prof. Macpherson said Tuesday. "It would be a good thing."

Asked what he thought their chances of achieving their aim were, he replied: "My impression is that the university is not adverse to it."

Frank Stone, university vice-president (administration), declined to commit himself until more details of the proposed arrangement are available.

He said the matter of college federation had

Mixed campus reaction to possible Co-op college status

been worked out over a long period of time and with a great deal of discussion and debate.

"It will take some pretty careful thought to work out the details of a case like this," he explained, and went on to say that it was largely a case of waiting to see exactly what the Co-op proposed and then deciding whether the university could accept that.

Vice President Woodside stated: "While I have considerable admiration for what they have done and are doing, the time is not right for them to become a college of the University of Toronto."

"A college should earn its way," he continued. He explained that he meant that if the Co-op, or any group, wants the privileges of college status, it should be in a position to teach its students.

Howard Staats, third-year student at Osgoode Hall and president of the Co-op board of directors, further clarified the status of the proposed Rochdale college.

It would be as autonomous as the Co-op now is, he explained.

"The board of governors would exercise only ultimate control," he said. "They would act only in the event that we were doing something contrary to the principles of the university."

Design for ice palace selected

The winning design for the Winter Carnival ice palace was submitted by architecture freshman Chris Wallace.

The design was chosen by the Blue and White Society Tuesday on the recommendation of their ice palace committee. It was one of five submitted.

Jay Keystone (II UC), chairman of the committee, said he recommended Wallace's design "because of what we can do with it."

It is interesting to look at, adaptable to special lighting effects, and usable for the activities of the carnival, he explained.

The design, 40 feet square, and 21 feet high is an L-shaped castle.

The main walls are 16 feet high, with a tower on the inside of the angle rising an extra five feet.

It will be constructed by the engineers with 80 tons of ice donated by Coca-Cola Ltd. and a crane loaned by Pirini Ltd. It is not known yet when construction will begin, but the palace will be up a full week before the Carnival begins Jan. 31.

Brothers Four to sing at Winter Carnival

The brothers Four have been signed as headliners of this year's Winter Carnival concert. They will give a two-hour concert in Varsity Arena Sunday, Feb. 2.

Carnival '64 gets under way Jan. 31 with an intercollegiate league hockey game, featuring the top-rated Varsity Blues.

Later in the evening the official opening ceremonies will launch the carnival from the Ice Palace on the front campus. A torchlight parade will lead off to Varsity Arena and the Ice Frolics show, featuring some of the finest skating talent in Canada.

Outdoors events fill the slate for Saturday. Log-sawing, bed-pushing and toilet bowl contests, along with judging of ice sculpture, beard-growing and shaving contests will be featured.

Contrary to some rumors, the Grand Prix Chariot Race will be reappearing this year under a revised set of rules.

Carnival-goers can dance to the Twist free in Hart House after the outdoor activities.

Saturday evening, the Winter Carnival semi-formal dance will be held to the music of five bands in Hart House. There will also be singing in the Arbor Room.

An interdenominational Brotherhood service will be given in Hart House Sunday morning.

In the afternoon, a Tri-University Concert will feature the Hart House chorus as part of the show.

Sunday evening will see the concert in Varsity Arena with the Brothers Four, followed by the closing ceremonies and presentation of trophies to the winners of the Saturday events.

Tickets for the Ice Frolics and the Arena Show go on sale today in the SAC office.

SAC prepares for hearings

University of Toronto students and organizations will be presented with an opportunity to state their views on student government when the university committee of the Students' Administrative Council starts hearings Jan. 13.

The committee will hear and discuss submissions regarding the role of SAC. Hearings will probably be held in one of the Hart House Sitting Rooms, although no definite location has yet been determined, and will continue for one week.

Don Rogers (III UC), secretary of the committee said Tuesday that they were basically interested in long-range ideas.

"We want suggestions as to what SAC should be doing over the next 10 years," he said. "The SAC constitution is somewhat outdated and will eventually have to be completely revised."

"Results of these hearings may initiate changes in the constitution."

Anyone who wishes to do so may present a submission oral or written, to the hearings, but he must advise the committee of his intention to do so before 2 p.m. Friday.

The Crown withdrew the charge

Another student arrived shortly after, charged with the same offence.

Bryce spoke with him. The second student spoke to the Crown prosecutor.

That charge was hastily withdrawn too.

Fleming new B of G member

Ex-finance and justice minister Donald Fleming was appointed to the board of governors of the U of T, it was announced yesterday by Premier John Robarts.

A graduate of University College (2TS), Mr. Fleming received the Governor-General's gold medal and the Bruls gold medal when he graduated. He graduated from the faculty of law in 1930.

He was a member of the Senate from 1945 to 1948. He holds an honorary Doctor of Civil Laws from Bishops' University.

Mr. Fleming had not been officially informed of the appointment when contacted for comment by The Varsity.

"I am delighted to be associated again with my old university. I am grateful for the honor to serve on its board of governors."

There will be an important organizational meeting of all persons interested in writing for The Varsity this term today at 1 p.m. in the Varsity office.

We don't want to get mendicant or anything like that, but we really can use people who are willing to give a few hours each week for the next two months. Reporters and typists are most welcome.

Hot nights or the office are a real experience in one way or another, and are always fun. Still more fun when there are more people around.

For present and potential reporters, that's 1 p.m. today, briefly.

David Bryce (I Vic) appeared in magistrate's court Monday and pleaded not guilty to a charge of illegally parking in front of 41 Willcocks.

He told the Crown prosecutor that there was no city ordinance against parking there.

University takes over housing service

The university administration has taken over the housing service formerly run by the Students' Administrative Council.

This move had been suggested in 1961 by a presidential advisory committee on housing, which included several SAC representatives.

Big plans are being made for the new full-time housing service. The administration is planning to go beyond the regular listing routine, into an expansion of effort from both student and householder.

Rosemary Harrap, executive-secretary of the SAC, said that the full-time service was the answer to a real problem.

"It will provide the continuity needed by a student who finds himself stranded for one reason or another in the middle of the year when the housing service has come to the end of its term."

"Now that the service has been expanded," she said, "the logical place to expand is in seeking out places to stay."

Miss Harrap said that while plans are actually only in the talking stages, several suggestions had been made, such as more inspection of the lodgings, and student reports on the householder.

She also mentioned the possibility of a plan of householder education on the needs of the student. "It would mean more money for the householder and more satisfaction for the student," she said.

The new housing service has its headquarters in Rm. 202 of the Placement Service offices at the corner of Spadina and Willcocks St.

The International Students' Festival is expanding this year into a full week of activities between February 3-8, ending with the Festival show Saturday evening at Harbord Collegiate.

Quiz tryout next week

Starting date for Toronto's first interfaculty quiz tournament is the week of Jan. 27.

The tournament, which is organized and administered completely by students, is patterned after the television quiz program, College Bowl.

Any undergraduate is eligible to try out for the team from his faculty. Try-outs are to be held next week in different places for each faculty. Watch for posters which will be up by this Friday in gathering places on campus.

Audience facilities are provided on a first-come, first-served basis, and spectators are welcome.

A sample question for both the try-outs and the tournament would follow the lines of: In the mythology of what country would the figures of Isis and Osiris appear?

The tournament itself will finish at the end of February. Contests will be held between 1 and 2 p.m. in University College.

Watch for team schedules in the Varsity.

Glee Club leader dies

Rowland Pack, director of the Hart House Glee Club from 1958-62, died Friday in Princess Margaret Hospital after a long illness. He was 35.

A noted Toronto musician, Mr. Pack was the first cellist of both the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the CBC Symphony. He was a graduate of The Royal Conservatory here

Under his direction, the Hart House Glee Club made its first commercial record, an album called An Evening with the Hart House Glee Club.

Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley praised Mr. Pack for building so well on the foundation made by the previous director, Ward McAdam. "He produced a high standard of performance in the group that was quite superb," said Mr. McCulley. Mr. Pack asked to be relieved of his duties as director in July 1962, after he had directed the club for a year while ill.

If so, be present at the Varsity office in the basement of the SAC building at 1:15 p.m. today of a meeting of all Varsity photographers and anyone interested in joining the prize-winning staff.

Ask if technical schools equal to universities

By JIM MACKENZIE
Varsity News Editor

The incumbent whisper among many university students that technical institutes produce nothing but inferior thinkers, incapable of matching the calibre of university editors, was exposed for what it was worth at last month's Canadian University Press conference.

The Gateway, student newspaper at the University of Alberta, after investigating the qualifications of students at the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology to put out a paper, felt that tech school papers were (1) in the hands of high school graduates who did not meet the minimum college entrance requirements and (2) possibly editorially controlled by the school administration.

The Gateway motion to restrict membership of tech schools in CUP was defeated.

The Gateway report included such statement as "... most people would agree that these institutions do not in any way constitute an academic community," and "there is controversy as to whether technical schools are institutions beyond the secondary level."

The criticisms may be valid in Alberta. Certainly, the SAIT editor (who was not present at the CUP conference) thinks they are.

Many Alberta tech courses admit students after Grade 10. The representative of the Emery Weal, SAIT's paper, at the conference denied knowledge of consultation between the Weal and The Gateway concerning staff interference in editorial policy.

But one provincial situation should not rule out future membership in a national press service by technical schools across the country. Tech schools are increasing in number annually, and universities should look upon them as in need of as much participation in national student activity as possible.

The investigation committee was thinking of keeping within the terms of the CUP constitution, which, it felt, was being violated by institutions like SAIT.

It also felt that squabbles with student government and problems regarding continuity of staff made tech schools weak sisters in CUP. Actually, the same problems are faced by most university papers.

Voting delegates realized that CUP was a service to student papers, a help to editorial and technical improvement. They realized it wasn't a club of scholarly journals manned by types who live on intellectual chewing gum.

Current lecture series to re-evaluate progress

The University College Literary and Athletic Society's Current lecture series starts this term. Detailed plans were finally announced this week for the program of lecture-seminars.

This year's curriculum concentrates on how genuine is the concept of progress held by the student. This re-evaluation of progress will be studied in relation to the development of the individual student.

Each of the five lecture programs will consist of a Tuesday lecture in the West Hall of University College; a seminar with the guest speaker on Wednesday in Hart House; and auxiliary seminars with U of T faculty members on Thursday.

Paul Tillich, existentialist theologian and author of The Courage To be and Dynamics of Faith, will be a speaker. Herbert Marcuse of Brandeis University, author of Reason and Revolution, theologian-philosopher Etienne Gilson, political scientist C. B. Macpherson and communications expert Marshall McLuhan will also take part.

The main theme of the program is based upon the idea of man in the modern age.

Notices of dates and listings of events can be found on posters in university buildings.

Visiting French professor to lecture on semantics

An eight-part lecture series on the meaning of words, "Semantics," starts today at 4:10 p.m. in Rm. 106, University College.

UC French Professor Stephen Ullmann, currently on visit from the University of Leeds, will give the weekly lectures on behalf of the department of romance languages and literatures.

Prof. Ullmann has a long list of distinguished associations with the study of semantics. He took his B. A. and Ph. D from the Budapest University before becoming a British subject in 1946.

With six books published and two in preparation, Prof. Ullmann is a member of the council of the Philological Society and of the advisory council of the publication Romance Philology.

He has also taught at the University of Glasgow, where he has received an honorary doctor of letters degree.

THE PROBLEMS OF UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT

1

By KEN DRUSHKA

Lost amid the public hue and cry over the so called population crisis in (Canadian higher education is a problem recognized by a few as the most important one facing universities today — the problem of university government.

Basically, the governmental problem falls into two categories: the internal governing of a university, and the relationship between the universities and the provincial governments.

In all provinces, and particularly in Ontario, the latter problem has reached near crisis proportions. And to complicate matters further, the problem of internal government, particularly at the University of Toronto, threatens to jeopardize the position of the university vis a vis the provincial government.

STRESS ON POPULATION

As far as the general public is concerned the problems do not exist. The daily press has so far concentrated on the more spectacular news associated with a possible lack of space for students. Occasional references to the underlying problems find their way into news columns, but this usually is only a paragraph or two from a politician's or university president's speech.

Nor is public knowledge increased by the participants in the situation. Most meetings and discussions on university affairs are held behind closed doors. Few, if any, politicians have any detailed knowledge of university affairs; the newspapers have no reporters assigned to university education, and even if they did, a definite reticence on the part of those connected with university affairs precludes an intelligent understanding of the situation.

The threat to the universities from the Ontario government—and it can justifiably be termed a threat—comes largely as a result of the increased expenditures of public funds on university education.

Because of the growth in both the size and number of Ontario universities, more and more government financial support is required every year.

UNDEFINED RELATIONSHIP

But under the present government-university relationship there is no clear channel of responsibility between the two bodies. As the government spends more money, many of its members would like to see more control over the universities exerted by the group that pays the piper.

In addition there is a move to establish a definite relationship between the two groups on a departmental basis, possibly through the Ontario department of education—the latter idea being one that terrifies university administrators.

INTERNAL PROBLEM

And here enters the problem of internal university administration. It is a widely held opinion that the strongest opposition to any undesirable governmental advances can be made by cohesive university community.

But now an embryo of an academic schism between the three constituent bodies of the U of T—and other universities—threatens the cohesion.

As the pressures of growth increase and as new ideas of university administration emerge, the three bodies—faculty, student and administration—all are jockeying for a new and stronger position in the administrative structure of the university.

The basis of the quiet discord is quite straightforward: How much power should each of the three groups have in the two streams of the university structure—the academic and the administrative.

TEACHER-STUDENT AUTONOMY

The visible conflict stems from an accelerated desire on the part of teachers and students to wrest more autonomy and increased responsibility from the administration.

In addition to their domination over academic matters, the teachers wish a voice in the administrative activities of the university which now are controlled by the board of governors and hired administrators.

The students, whose activities are limited to those of a minor administrative nature, are asking for autonomy over their own administrative functions and are starting to ask for a voice in academic affairs.

U OF T INFLUENCE

These same conflicts are being felt at other Canadian universities, but the importance of the U of T situation lies in the position of leadership this university has established. Whatever solution is decided upon here will have a profound effect on the decisions made at other universities.

In Ontario the other universities look to the U of T as the most powerful voice; in the Canadian context, the solution reached here will in many ways set a precedent for actions in other provinces, particularly because many other Canadian universities are structured on the U of T model.

THE ADMINISTRATION

At U of T the administration consists of the board of governors and the administrative staff. The latter group is headed by President Claude Bissell, Administrative Vice-President Frank Stone and Academic Vice-President Moffat St. Andrew Woodside.

This triumvirate is flanked by the registrar, Robin Ross; the executive assistant to the president, J. H. Sword; the comptroller, G. L. Court; the secretary of the board of governors, J. F. Brook; the director of alumni affairs, J. C. Evans; and others.

This is the first in a series of seven articles on the problems of internal university administration and the relationship between the university and the Ontario government.

Today's article is a general outline of the situation with some background information. The following articles will deal with the particular groups involved and some of the individuals who are involved in the university and the government.

THE STUDENTS

The student voice is represented officially by the Students' Administrative Council, and this year largely by the voice of President Doug Ward. The influence of past council members and presidents is still felt, and still exerted by those on campus now.

Whether the SAC can be considered representative of student opinion is a debatable point. The SAC is accepted as the only representative voice but the Campus Co-op, and its energetic business manager Howard Adelman, is also making itself heard, and in many ways provides a second student voice.

THE TEACHERS

Faculty opinion is expressed officially in the Senate—and, so far, unofficially through the U of T Association of the Teaching Staff and its president, Professor Bora Laskin, of the faculty of law.

But the Senate, the university's academic body, is not generally considered an effective vehicle for the expression of teachers' opinions and actions. Besides teachers, the Senate includes academic administrators, such as deans and department heads, and there is in many cases a definite difference of opinion between these persons and the general teaching staff.

THE GOVERNMENT

When speaking of the Ontario government, the important persons involved in the university question are not immediately visible; and even Dr. Bissell has commented that he does not always know who he is dealing with.

At the top of the Queen's Park pile is Premier John Robarts, a former minister of education and a man with many ideas on education—university and otherwise.

Hovering quietly in the background is Education Minister William Davis, the government's youngest cabinet minister.

But the man who is probably in most direct contact with the universities is John McCarthy, the secretary of the advisory committee on university affairs for the Ontario government. Mr. McCarthy also happens to be the superintendent of the curriculum and text books branch of the Ontario department of education.

And then there's the grand old patriarch of Ontario politics, Leslie Frost. The former premier is acting chairman of the advisory committee. Although he has made no public statements in his capacity as chairman, his mere presence and his past interest in education carries a great deal of weight.

The situation then is one of a developing conflict within the university which could, if allowed to develop, weaken the cohesion of the university and its position in the conflict with the provincial government.

But the situation cannot be fully understood without considering the individual personalities and the views they hold.

We shall overcome...

By MURRAY SOUPCOFF

The University of Toronto Students' Violence Co-ordinating Committee met yesterday at 3 a.m. in the Zanzibar Tavern.

The aim of the committee, stated chairman Doug Sword, is to organize local violence on and off campus to allow students more obvious and manifest outlets for their repressed aggressions and frustrations previously expressed in such sublimated and sissy activities as marches on Ottawa and Queen's Park.

As a first step, he said, the committee will recommend as a permanent feature of the school year an annual riot during which students will be permitted to demonstrate, scuffle and throw beer bottles in the name of the cause of their choice. In addition, a fund-raising drive could be held to send students to Tokyo and other unstable centres to learn street fighting techniques.

A second step, Mr. Sword continued, would be the propagation of the Committee's theme: "Let's Put The Violence Back Into Protest." In this direction, the committee is planning the sale of "Violent" Valentine's Day Cards with scenes from the recent riot in Moscow and from the Ben Casey T. V. program. And as a deterrent to peaceful protest, transcripts of Premier Robarts' remarks to the bicultural march on Queen's Park will be distributed.

Another aim of the movement, he added, is to extend the sphere of student violence beyond the American Embassy. As a result, the committee intends to extend support to all phases of protest. For example, plans are under way for a torchlight parade down Avenue Road in support of better housing facilities for Australian Aborigines. And members will be sent to aid the Pretoria City Women League's fight for more comprehensive milk delivery. A delegation will also be sent to Cyprus to participate in any possible stone throwing or shooting. However, Mr. Sword believes that opportunities in Ghana have been grossly exaggerated and hence no representatives will be sent there at this time.

...with violence

To popularize the movement at home, the committee intends in the near future to hold a Youth Seminar on Violence during rush hour in the Eglinton Subway Station. In addition, "ban the (fill in your choice)" buttons will be distributed. And for elementary and secondary schoolers, an essay contest on the subject: "What The Black Muslims Mean To Me" will be held. First prize will be color movies of the Toronto-Chicago hockey brawl with an added sound-track of Punch Imlach's reaction when he was fined $1,000.

It is hoped that in this way, such activity will have a wider appeal for the bulk of students who, have previously refrained from collective expression but have been judged by the action of a vocal minority anyway.

rochdale college

The announcement that the Campus Co-operative Residence Inc. may soon become a residential college within the University of Toronto is one of the most encouraging pieces of news we have heard concerning the university community.

The informed reaction to this news appears to be generally favorable, although some opposition may be heard from the old university establishment.

For more than five years we have been hearing an increasing cry of concern over the problems created by the population rise in the universities. The facilities for classrooms, offices and residences are now stretched to the limit, and the necessary funds for expansion are difficult to come by.

More recently we have begun to hear the voices of critics who maintain that the methods and approaches to university education are breaking down, partially as a result of expansion pressures. These claims would lead us to believe there is a need for new concepts, and new approach to university education.

If the Campus Co-op is chartered as Rochdale College it will make a valuable contribution to both these problems.

It will help alleviate the problem the residence space, which is something it has done for many years. The Co-op has provided the only living accommodation for married students; it has always provided the lowest rate on residence fees in the university.

If it receives its charter, the Co-op will be able to provide these and other services at an even lower cost to its members, and it will be able to expand more rapidly to meet future needs.

But perhaps even more important is that with college status the Co-op can inject new ideas into the academic system.

The unique aspect of the Co-op is that it is run by students for students. For those who believe this to be a radical concept, it might be worthwhile to know that student administration is one of the oldest concepts in university education.

Many of the best universities in Europe were founded in medieval times by students who gathered, hired teachers and formed the beginners of respected academic communities.

It is to be hoped the Co-op becomes Rochdale College and a full-fledged member of the university community.

the sac inaction

The Students' Administrative Council meets for the first time this term tonight, and according to all indications it promises to be one of the duller meetings conducted in the Hart House debates room.

Considering this year's council, the meeting tonight will not be unusual. With one or two exceptions the meetings and council achievements this year have been singularly lacking in achievement.

Most of council's accomplishments have been initiated by two or three members through commissions which are semi-independent of council. Probably the most has been done by the Canadian-Canadian committee, under Richard Pope. The coming university committee hearings may do a great deal for students in the long range.

But council as a whole and most of its individual members have done little more than adequate job for fulfilling the duties of their various departments.

When one considers what could be done for the students of this university by their elected representatives, the lack of initiative and action becomes very disheartening.

What's doing in Aluminum SMELTING?

More—much more—than meets the eye: the technology of producing aluminum in our smelters is constantly changing. Talented graduates in extractive metallurgy, chemical and many other branches of engineering—experiment with and develop new processes and design new technical controls. They are responsible for the transforming, plant distribution and rectification of electricity; the electrolysis of alumina by the Hall & Heroult process; the production of carbon electrodes and the casting of aluminum and its alloys. In addition they may be involved in project, maintenance and industrial engineering. Graduate chemists will also find interesting careers in such fields as control, development and research. Indeed—there's a lot doing in the five aluminum smelters we operate across Canada:

- At Kitimat, B.C.: (where our picture, showing a crucible filled with molten aluminum, was taken), 192,000 tons installed capacity of aluminum ingot per year.
- At Arvida, Quebec: 373,000 tons installed capacity of aluminum per year.
- At Isle Maligne, Quebec: 115,000 tons installed capacity of aluminum ingot per year.
- At Shawinigan, Quebec: 70,000 tons installed capacity of aluminum ingot per year.
- At Beauharnois, Quebec: 38,000 tons installed capacity of aluminum ingot per year.

Expansion program passes halfway

An aerial view of the construction at New College

vsp. HENRI

By BRUCE KIDD

Bulldozers, steel girders, concrete blocks, and now that winter's here, sheets of polyethylene; spanning new lecture rooms without lights or air-conditioning; mud everywhere and plenty of noise—these are the earmarks of a campus in evolution.

The University of Toronto's expansion program has passed the halfway mark in its race to accommodate 25,000 students on this campus by 1970, and now it begins its final kick. Already 15 new buildings have had their blue ribbons cut, and then have been unceremoniously thrown open to the mob. Two more will be completed this year.

At least eight more buildings will be provided under the program's more than $120 million budget. Construction is well under way on four of these, while the first sod has yet to be turned for the others.

The campaign got under way in late 1957, and those buildings first to shoot up have now become so familiar, that students tend to dissociate them from the construction in progress today.

First to go up was the University of Toronto Press building, sandwiched between Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, Knox and New Colleges. But right on its heels were constructed the Galbraith Building, and four women's residences—Loretto College, Margaret Addison, and new wings to St. Hilda's College and Whitney Hall.

But while new structures like these and the Victoria Library, the Gerald Larkin Building, and the Law Library have been integrated with existing landmarks on the traditional campus, the main thrust of the expansion drive has been felt on land recently purchased by the University, the area west of St. George Street.

Although the outside brick walls of the northernmost of this trio have been completed and window glass installed, finishing the interior will require almost another year, and the Zoology Building isn't scheduled to be in use until next September.

Other structures on the West Campus already getting the full treatment are the Benson Building—the stronghold of the femmes fatales—and the Pharmacy Building.

Just north of the pillpushers' new retreat, the ground has been broken for the New College dormitory-classroom complex. This L-shaped five-storey structure is expected to provide residence space for 300 male students, and tutorial, dining, and social facilities for another 1,200 students. The administrative offices of New College are expected to be ready for use by next fall.

Eventually expected to dovetail with New, is a similarly designed multi-faculty college now in the planning stage.

Of non-residential structures on the West Campus, top priority has been given to the new physics building, construction of which will begin shortly. The 14-storey edifice, topped by an observatory for the Department of Astronomy, will be the focal point of the West Campus. And the highest structure on campus won't be content until it stretches far beyond its ground-level boundaries. Under the ground on two levels will be labs for nuclear physics.

Still in the tentative file are a new men's athletic building and an international centre to be financed in cooperation with a Canadian service club. Simply waiting for a starting date for construction, are the new quarters for the School of Social Work, the entire $2.4 million cost of which is being assumed by Metropolitan Toronto.

By far the most intriguing aspect of the expansion scheme is the plan to push the university right off this campus. Soon to be built are two degree-granting satellite colleges, both 15 miles from the downtown campus.

Both colleges—Scarborough and Erindale—will specialize in the general course, which has presently by far the largest enrolment of any course offered by the university.

Both Scarborough and Erindale will offer the same curriculum prescriptions, the same scholastic competence as are required on the main campus. Accordingly, their students can be assured of obtaining a respected degree.

The satellite colleges will be staffed by full members of the university, and will enjoy all the research facilities of the present campus. Each will have its own undergraduate library of eventually 100,000 volumes, and these will be supplemented by a shuttle service with the main library.

Scarborough expects to begin operations in the autumn of 1965. Envisioned enrolment for both satellites has been set at 5,000.

By no means has the expansion program proceeded strictly according to the original blueprint drawn up in 1957. The initial scheme has constantly been revised and additions made. As recently as March of 1962, plans for the international centre, and the satellite colleges had yet to be conceived.

By the same token, construction on this campus will not end with 1970 and the completion of the present program. After the completion of New College and its yet-unnamed partner, the university would like to add at least four more residential colleges to this campus.

The only serious limiting factor for the expansion program is the money. Where does it come from? Of the more than $120 million budget, most has been contributed by government, and the provincial government has kicked in by far the largest share. The university's own campaign, the National Fund, went well over its objective and already has collected $15,000,000.

Expansion of a university certainly entails much more than the provision of physical facilities—in addition to classrooms and labs, students require teachers, libraries, and recreational facilities—but the present building splurge will give this university the structural framework within which to operate. With 6,000 additional students here in the next six years, we can be confident that each will have enough space to sit down.

BACHELORS, MASTERS AND Ph.D'S IN CHEMISTRY OR CHEMICAL ENGINEERING

Chemical engineers and chemists will find that research and development at Columbia Cellulose offers unique opportunities in the fields of cellulosic chemistry to Canadian graduates at all levels.

Our Research and Development Division, soon to be relocated in a new $900,000 Research Center in Vancouver, B.C., concerns itself with scientific activities ranging from short term, highly practical developments, through applied research into longer term basic studies. For this reason, R & D is organized into four groups:

DEVELOPMENT — Development is the responsibility of the Sulphite and Kraft Groups. Both groups are concerned with the evaluation of raw materials and the improvement of our present products and processes. The Sulphite Group is concerned mainly with the chemical properties of the raw materials and products and the chemistry of the processes involved in the purification of cellulose. The Kraft Group's main concern is with the physical properties of wood fibres and the effect of processing on the physical characteristics of pulp.

APPLIED RESEARCH — Our applied research efforts are carried out in anticipation of the Company's future requirements. The general objectives of these activities are the better utilization of our forest reserves and the development of new products and processes outside our present operations.

MORE DETAILS — Brochures outlining in more detail the activities of the Research and Development Division are available at your campus employment office.

FOR INTERVIEWS — Graduating and Post Graduate students to the Ph.D. level in either Chemistry or Chemical Engineering are invited to discuss employment opportunities with senior representatives of the R&D Division on Jan. 15 & 16, 1964.

See your employment office for an appointment.

BENSON DOINGS

POTS wins cage crown with upset

By MARILYN LAMSON

The girls of Physical and Occupational Therapy pulled an upset by winning their Interfaculty Basketball Championship.

In doing so, the POT Sr. "A" team wrested the title from PHE III with a 34-28 decision.

In the consolation finals, PHE IIA overwhelmed UC Srs. 34-19.

The season's top point-getter was Sharon Dandy (II POT) with a total of 124 points in nine games. She was closely followed by teammate Judy Archer (II POT) with 122 points.

HOCKEY

The women are once again flitting across the glassy surfaces of Varsity Arena in gay pursuit of elusive pucks and hard-to-win championships. Armed with shin pads and hockey sticks the non-helmeted females are finding Father Bauer's standards very challenging.

The hockey season, underway since before Christmas, has attracted many participants. The traditional rivalry between Vic, St. Hilda's and PHE has not lessened but with the eight-goal single-game performance of Medicine's Patty Gair, the all-strong triumvirate might have some competition.

VOLLEYBALL

The schedule opens next Tuesday at 5 p.m.

On Wednesday evening an instruction clinic will be held for any girls interested in playing or refereeing volleyball.

INTERCOL

Varsity will play host to McMaster in volleyball, basketball and badminton at the Benson Building, Thursday at 7 p.m. The teams are recovering from post-New Year's blues, but the competition will be at a higher level than in past years.

Racquetees battle for Rimmer's mug

University of Toronto will enter an all-Trinity College team in the "B" Division of the Ontario squash team championships at the Toronto Badminton and Racquet Club this weekend.

The seven-man "Trinity" team consists of Leighton McCarthy, Hugh Parker, Doug Tilley, Paul Wilson, Frank Buck, Don Matthews and Wally Ross. Wilson, Matthews and Ross are rookie graduates from Varsity's "B" team.

University of Western Ontario will also be competing in the championships, which should give Varsity an indication of their chances at the intercollegiate title meet in February.

At stake this weekend is a trophy presented by Varsity coach Ralph Rimmer this year for the provincial "B" team championship.

SCM strives to produce intelligent action

By CAROL BURNHAM

"What's new with the SCM?" I asked, as I was led into a small office where every available surface was covered with books. George Hopton, general secretary of the Student Christian Movement, appeared above a stack of papers.

Two things are new at the SCM, he answered, an emphasis on student seminars, and the Inn of the Unmuzzled Ox. I smiled as if I knew all about unmuzzled oxes. George wasn't fooled. The name comes from the Bible, he said, Deut. 25:4, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn."

"The Ox" is the latest in campus coffee shops. It is also an experiment for the SCM in communication through the mediums of folk singing, poetry, and play reading. "We have even had an Engineer who writes poetry," George said.

"The trend today seems to be towards student action, rather than debate and discussion," I said. "Can the SCM meet the challenge?"

"We tend to do a lot of talking, don't we Jane?" George replied. Jane Blanchard, the SCM's Girl Friday, agreed as she clambered over a desk to answer the phone.

"We want the student to find out where he wants his life to count in terms of action," George continued. "We will never leave the discussions, lectures and seminars, because these prepare the student for intelligent action. There is a certain anonymity in the way the SCM makes its influence. The study groups often lead to student action in various ways in and outside of the university."

The SCM is not officially linked with any political body. Left-wing tendencies are apparent within the organization. "We are concerned with social action," said Jane, "and with the application of Christianity in the world."

Student action in the SCM is more possible in the summer projects, said George. These include a mental health, an industrial, and a white collar project. The students get jobs in these different fields, and study the problems related to their positions. Often they can find causes to work for through these projects.

"The big difficulty is in reaching the freshmen," said George. "They usually maintain their connection with a church, and don't have their faith challenged right away. Students come to the SCM when they have been troubled or challenged, and when they are asking questions."

George explained the new tendency to stress the seminars rather than the lectures. Other organizations seem to offer plenty in the way of lectures. The seminars deal not only with religious questions, but with various issues of life. "It gives the student a chance to test his inherited faith," he said.

Seminar topics range from "The Quest for the Historical Jesus" through "Existentialism" to "Communism". I talked to one student, George Hartwell (I Vic), who takes part in SCM seminars every day of the week. Since the seminars are all held at noon hour, he felt that he would rather do this than eat a leisurely lunch.

Hartwell found the mental health seminar, held on Friday nights, particularly interesting. The group studied "psycho drama," a method of dealing with mental illness. The members staged problems of human relations in the form of a play.

"In this way," said Hartwell, "the person gets a chance to rework his problem, and also to see why the other person acts the way he does. It is an intense experience."

The group goes once a week to the mental hospital on Queen Street to play cards with the patients, or just to talk with them over coffee. "It helps you to break a lot of prejudices about mental illness," said Hartwell, "and you feel that in some way you are helping these people."

The Inn of the Unmuzzled Ox is the other new venture of the SCM. Linda Britton, social convenor for the "Ox" says that it is mainly "a place to come and talk, to drop in casually." People sit around, munch on ox-burgers, and listen to everything from folk-singers to a poet with a "poetry-writing machine," a star attraction.

"We are not trying to compete in the entertainment world," she continued. "We believe that ideas can be communicated in this way. Discussions often last till 1 a.m."

People wandered in and out of the SCM offices continually while we talked. Some bought Christmas cards; some asked about the program for next term; others dropped in just to chat. The office is a hub-bub of activity. I came away feeling that I wanted to join everything at once. The Inn of the Unmuzzled Ox sounds enticing, if only to see whether they really have ox-burgers.

Above all, I was convinced that here were people who had ideas, and who made their ideas work. These are students who know what they want — students in action.

The nuclear virgin who never was

By IAN GENTLES

Few of us really doubted that Canada's nuclear virginity did in fact come to an end a good while ago, but the shipment of warheads into North Bay on New Year's Eve represented the first decisive public deflowering.

Now six days later, our prime minister has announced that Canada was never actually serious about being in the nuclear club, and now wants to get out of it. This steadfast marching in a backwards direction—accepting nuclear weapons while proclaiming our firm intention of getting rid of them—must provoke wonderment at the political contortions which Mr. Pearson is able to perform.

He is of course following honorably in the footsteps of Mackenzie King in the ambiguity of his public statements. Myth deems it necessary for a Canadian prime minister to use such ambiguity to preserve national unity.

But it is fair to ask if the Canadian nation would really have come crashing humpty-like to the ground had Pearson had the courage of his apparent belief that a nuclear role is unnecessary for Canada. It probably would not.

We have spent and are continuing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on weapons that contribute precisely nothing to Western defence. The report published last month by the special committee on defence sets out facts which the government must have been aware of for some time. The four big shiny new Honest John rocket launchers which we are giving to our European brigade for Christmas are said to be of "little military value" (read useless). The CF-104 has had its style cramped by the fact that it was designed for tactical nuclear warfare, and this concept has been rejected by most American strategists.

The CF-104 at present cannot be used in a conventional role and is highly vulnerable to a first strike.

When it comes to the Bomarc and the Voodoo, both of which are stationed here in Canada, the committee treads more delicately. It recommends that both weapons be retained until they have become obsolete—a tongue-in-cheek statement if there ever was one. It admits that the Bomarc and Voodoo are useless against a missile attack, but pleads that they are still good against bombers. Here the committee is ignoring all the statements by experts from McNamara to General Simonds.

It is whistling in the dark to hope that Russia will start her attack on North America by sending over her bombers. Bombers would take four or five hours to get here. Common sense requires that the Russians send over ballistic missiles first to wipe out the Bomarc and Voodoo bases so that the bombers could then come across unhindered.

Another interesting point raised in the defence committee report is the problem of the drain on our dollar which results from having an infantry brigade and eight air squadrons stationed in Europe. This brings up the whole question of our balance of payments deficit. For many years our excess of imports over exports has been close to a billion dollars every year.

This has had to be balanced by selling more and more of our economy to the United States. At the same time we have been spending more than 14 billion dollars on our defence budget. Most of this money goes outside the country—to be spent by soldiers in Europe, or to pay for obsolete military hardware from the United States. It may be paradoxically true that to regain her national independence Canada needs to eliminate her defence spending and again set about taking charge of her own economy.

What about the suggestion that we cut our armed forces to a well-trained unit numbering about 25,000 men to be designated at a standby force for possible UN use? The rest of the money could be devoted to a program of reducing unemployment, stimulating the economy, and re-establishing our national independence.

FORMER WESTERN MUSTANG AND EDMONTON ESKIMO

Canadian college gridders are catching Americans — Alberta coach Gino Fracas

Special to The Varsity

Edmonton — Gino Fracas, coach of University of Alberta Golden Bears, says that Canadian college football players could be as good as Americans within three to five years.

The 33-year-old former pro, who led his team to the unofficial national intercollegiate title in his rookie coaching year, says the main advantage Americans have had is that they start learning the game early and get good coaching at the high school level.

Fracas is encouraged by the fact that five graduates of Canadian high schools made first string in their freshman year with Golden Bears.

What's more, Fracas says, four or five players with his team are good enough to graduate to the Canadian pro league.

The explanation?

"We're getting better coaching now at a lower level," says Fracas.

Fracas, a native of Windsor who played fullback with Western Mustangs from 1951 to 1955, was converted to an inside linebacker when he played for Edmonton Eskimos from 1955 to 1962.

He is in his fourth year at Alberta as an assistant professor teaching Physical Education.

Fracas says the calibre of the Senior Intercollegiate League hasn't improved since he played at Western but the west has improved greatly.

He figures two teams, Alberta and UBC, could play in the eastern college circuit and a third, Manitoba, is getting close to the eastern standard.

Fracas mentioned that St. Francis Xavier of Antigonish,

N.S., might challenge Alberta's claim to the unofficial national title by virtue of their post-season Atlantic Bowl victory over University of Toronto Blues.

He draws attention to the fact however, that Queen's Golden Gaels, the SIFL champs and the team Alberta defeated 25-7 in the east-west game, had beaten Varsity twice in league play.

As for the possibility of setting up a formal arrangement for determining a national champ, Fracas said it is complicated by the fact that there are four or five intercollegiate leagues in Canada.

Eligibility would be another problem. Fracas says a man could play football at Queen's for eight years and for Alberta for only five years.

Barker and Schoenborn hold out for "benefits" before big game

How many championship calibre teams have been shipwrecked simply by one or two prima donnas in the crew? Soon to be added to that overcrowded graveyard is one more potential world-beater — there's dissension on the Varsity hockey team.

While the SAC squad is rapidly rolling into shape through long hours of early morning practice at Varsity Arena, the Varsity Inkmen have yet to begin workouts. Several key performers refuse to come to terms with the management.

Biting his upper lip, Varsity manager-coach Rick "Punch" Kollins yesterday disclosed Steve "Body-Basher" Barker and Al "Shutout" Schoenborn are holding out for more money and other plush benefits.

If the Inkmen fail to sign either Barker or Schoenborn, the SAC Fluffies will be a 10-goal favorite to capture the Warren Stevens Memorial trophy in the crucial Winter Carnival Weekend clash.

Surely most callous of the two holdouts is Schoenborn, the Inkmen's goaltending wizard. Shutout Al is threatening to sell out to the other side if his 15-point ultimatum is not met in full.

Among other things, Schoenborn demands a $15,000 salary, a seven-year no-cut contract, and first-class essays for three of his French courses.

Wept "Punch" Kollins: "These demands are ridiculous."

While Barker's demands are less greedy than Schoenborn's, any attempt to meet them would send the paper into hock. All-Star's terms are quite simple: he just asks for $25,000, that's all.

"Punch" hinted to the startled press he would have win his estranged players back by calling on their loyalty to the team. "For any other contest, I would expect to negotiate with these top performers, but for the SAC grudge-match this just breaks my heart. I'm hoping they'll make one last appearance... for the team." In the Mesh: Kollins' other performers are expected to sign contracts shortly. Among the returnees, veteran Alan Walker says he's in the best condition of his life, and hopes to lead the team in scoring again this season. High-flying Jungle Jim MacKenzie ridicules the sophomore jinx, and paired with Comrade Drushka should provide the toughest defence in the league. And winger Donna Mason already has fire in her eyes.

PHE takes half-way lead in T.A. Reed cup race

By AL SCHOENBORN
Varsity Fink

Physical and Health Education has taken a substantial lead in the race for the T. A. Reed Trophy at the half-way mark in the season. Last year's champion, Victoria College, is well back in the race.

The trophy is awarded annually to the college or faculty compiling the highest points based on performance and participation in all sports.

PHE has taken more than 3000-point lead over second-place Trinity in its first year of competition separate from University College.

In Division II, which has its own winner of the trophy from the smaller faculties, Law holds a slim lead over Wycliffe.

The system used in awarding points is based on the number of entries received from a college or faculty as well as the number of games won, the quality of competition, group standings, playoffs and overall championships.

In order to compensate for the difference in potential participation in the various colleges or faculties the basic points-total is multiplied by a ratio to obtain the final totals.

In Division I numerous point penalties due to defaults made a great difference in the final T. A. Reed standings.

UC alone was docked 600 points for Volleyball defaults, Victoria lost 550, Pharmacy 400, Dents and Meds 250 and SPS 200 points.

Hockey Blues rated best in nation by Ryerson Intercollegiate newsletter

Toronto Varsity Hockey Blues are rated as the top college team in the country in this week's Canadian Intercollegiate Athletics Newsletter, published at Ryerson Polytechnic Institute.

The ratings, compiled weekly by Keith Woods of Ryerson, have Blues ahead of McMaster Marlinis by virtue of Varsity's two exhibition-game victories over Marlinis.

Little-known St. Thomas College of the Atlantic Conference is rated third this week.

1. Toronto (OAAA)
2. McMaster (OAAA)
3. St. Thomas (Atlantic)
4. Edmonton (Western)
5. Acadia (Atlantic)
6. UBC (Western)
7. St. Francis Xavier (Atl.)
8. Loyola (OAAA)
9. OACV (Ontario)
10. Loyola (Ont.-St. Law.)

Woods predicts that Toronto, Edmonton, St. Thomas and Loyola will be represented at the national finals to be held in March at Kingston.

In basketball ratings, Varsity is ranked third behind Windsor Lancers and Acadia. But Woods sees Blues winning the OAAA title and then losing to Acadia in the national final at Windsor.

1. Windsor (OAAA)
2. Acadia (Atlantic)
3. Toronto (OAAA)
4. Western (OAAA)
5. Saskatchewan (West)
6. St. Francis (Atlantic)
7. UBC (Western)
8. Sir George Williams (Ont.-St. Law.)
9. Laurentian (Ontario)
10. Carleton (Ont.-St. Law.)

The intercollegiate newsletter is a private publication issued weekly from Ryerson. The unofficial inter-conference ratings are based on team records throughout the season.

Kidd sidelined again by old heel ailment

By UNCLE HARRY

The 1964 indoor track season goes to the post Saturday in Boston, but University of Toronto's perennial boards headliner Bruce Kidd is an unexpected scratch.

Early this week, Kidd received a slight recurrence of the achilles heel injury which plagued him throughout last summer, and has been advised to forgo the season's opener at Boston to allow the new inflammation to clear up.

As Kidd feels the new pull on the plantaris area of his heel is partially due to running on the sharp bends on the Hart House track, he will train solely outside in the next few weeks. Coach Fred Foot expects his protegee to be ready to race in the Maple Leaf Gardens Indoor Games here January 24.

The Boston Knights of Columbus meet has been an annual pilgrimage for Kidd. It was in the Boston Garden in 1960 the 17-year old high school student broke into the bigtime by upsetting Pete McArdle in the two-mile race.

Kidd's initial success in Beantown opened a floodgate of central Ontario athletes into the US indoor circuit. In 1962 Bill Crothers made his debut at the K of C Meet, and on Saturday a dozen local athletes will be competing on the Boston boards.

Varsity alumnus Crothers begins his ambitious indoor season Saturday in the 1,000-yard run, in which he will be seeking his third consecutive victory. Crothers intends to compete on the boards almost every weekend between now and the end of March.

IN THE INFIELD: The Maple-Leaf Games have announced the invitation of Australia's Albie Thomas to run in the three-mile against Kidd. Thomas, a former world record in the two-and three-mile runs, had long been considered over the hill, but has surprised the track world this winter by turning several quite fast times down under. One of these was a 13:51.4 5,000-metres triumph over 10,000-meter world holder Ron Clark.

Ex-Argo here for Blues' cage tilt

By PAUL HENDERSON

The Christmas vacation ends officially tonight for Toronto Varsity cagers when they meet Waterloo Lutheran University Golden Hawks in an exhibition tilt at Hart House.

Varsity Coach John McManus has all his charges in good health for this encounter, the second game in a home-and-home series. In the initial contest, Blues registered a 98-51 win at Waterloo. Hawks, are led by Bob Eaton, Gary Cuff and Ed Ochiena, a former Toronto Argonaut football player.

Blues have compiled a record of three wins and three losses this season. One of the victories was a 99-56 trouncing of McGill Redmen in the only OQAA game played to date.

All three defeats absorbed by Toronto were at the hands of strong American clubs, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo State.

Under the Basket: The chief rival of Waterloo Lutheran University, University of Waterloo, has its five starting players returning for the 1963-64 OQAA season. Touted as a "championship team" by the Coryphaeus, the U. of W. newspaper, the Warriors are led by 6'4" all-star Jerry Raphael.

Raphael scored 192 points in compiling a 19.2 points average to finish third in league statistics. He hooped 35 points against Waterloo college this year and netted 37 against Blues last season. Bob Pando, (120 points) took 11th spot while Jim Hann's 10.8 point average put him in 13th position.

A SERVICE FROM YOURS TRULY TO OUR READERS

This is that long-awaited and anticipated service provided annually by the sports editor of The Varsity to the thousands of readers who partake of this column with flawless regularity. It is that authoritative proclamation that allows the reader to forget about newspapers for the following 12 months because after it is presented there is no need for the news of the day. It is that candid bit of introspection that tells the readers beforehand what will unfold in the immediate future.

It is, of course, The Varsity sports editor's prognostication for 1964:

● February 14th will fall on a Friday this year. (I figure that's a safe way to start.)

● Varsity Hockey Blues will win the Queen's Cup as intercollegiate champions, but only by a single point over McMaster Marlin's. Blues will then defeat University of Alberta in the national final at Kingston.

● Blues' "Mop Line" of Steve Monteith, Sonny Osborne and Ward Passi will once again be the scourge of the league but Jim McLellan of McMaster will win the scoring title with 34 points.

● Bobby Apps of McMaster, son of former Maple Leaf Syl Apps, will be the highest scoring rookie in the hockey league.

● Windsor Lancers will win their second consecutive intercollegiate and national basketball titles with Varsity Blues finishing second in the standings, four points behind Lancers.

● Guards Tom Williamson of Western and Dave West of Varsity will wage another two-man battle for the cage scoring crown but West will come out on top this year.

● The Varsity will trounce the SAC in their Winter Carnival hockey classic. Goaltender Al (Two Legal Shutouts) Schoenborn will star for The Varsity.

● Varsity swimmers and wrestlers will win college championships in the spring term. Mike Chapelle will be the top rookie at the title swim meet.

● Bruce Kidd has too much determination not to win a gold medal at the Tokyo Olympics. Despite odds and the pessimism of so-called experts, Kidd will edge Russia's Bolotnikov in the 10,000 metres final. U of T alumnus Bill Crothers will come close to a world record in edging Peter Snell in the Olympic 800 metres.

● The fond dreams of Varsity football followers will not be rewarded in 1964 as the Blues have another losing season. Blues will return to their customary 2-4 record while Queen's walks away with the Yates Cup again with a 5-1 mark. Western Mustangs will improve and will finish second at 3-3 and McGill will tie with Blues at 2-4.

● Despite reports that Brian Conacher will give up football for pro hockey, the "Little Train" will return to Mustangs and win the intercollegiate scoring title.

● Varsity's Bill Watters will be drafted by the Toronto Argonauts but will return to Blues and repeat as an all-star linebacker. Gerry Sternberg and Kenny Davison will also repeat as all-stars.

● Jim Rhodes, Ranny Parker and Arnie Carefoot will return to Blues after a year's absence.

● Cal Connor will approach Peter Potter's record of longevity by quarterbacking Queen's Golden Gaels for yet another season.

● Varsity Rugger Blues will lose some of their power with the graduation of Paul (Golden Toe) Wilson. But the ruggerites will win their sixth college title in a row despite a defeat in the regular season.

● Western will win the soccer title with Varsity second. ● Physical and Health Education will win the T. A. Reed Trophy as the top faculty in intramural sports.

● Students at St. Michael's College will stage an all-night celebration after the Irish end Victoria's six-year hold on the Mulock Cup.

● McMaster will repeat as track champions.

● And, The Varsity sports editor will be refused a pension by SAC finance commissioner Larry Ward after announcing his retirement from the "rag."

EARLY YEAR FISTAMINATIONS

If you heard a rumor that oats have been planted on the west field of the back campus, believe it. It seems that after the field was renovated and sown with new grass seed late in November vandals staged their own sowing bee—with oats. Th oats were discovered on the field after the renovation job was completed. Since the oats could not be removed the only thing that can be done is for the University to cut the oats about three times a week after they come up in the spring. It will take a few months for the oat stock stobe to be eliminated. The seed company that worked on the field says that if the oats are ignored in the spring they may grow to a height of two-to-three feet. In that case Forestry would probably win the Mulock Cup.

Full puck weekend slated as season gets in stride

By GORD BELLMORE

All seven teams in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League are scheduled for action in the first big hockey weekend of the young season.

Defending champions McMaster Marlin's visit McGill and Queen's and stand an excellent chance of increasing their early league-lead over second-place Varsity Blues. Blues host Queen's here Friday night.

At McGill, Mac will meet a team experiencing a rough start. Redmen have managed only a tie in their two league games and recently lost to Boston College, which Blues swamped 9-1 in the recent Christmas tournament.

Neither Blues nor Marlin's should have any trouble with the weak Queen's team and if the other teams in the league perform according to the formcharts the weekend's action should set the basis for the predicted battle for the league lead between Marlin's, Laval Rouge et Or and Blues.

By a quirk in scheduling, Toronto's last three games are against these very teams. It appears that even at this early date the top teams are pointing toward these potentially crucial games to decide the championship, barring a major upset.

Blues coach Joe Kane feels the key is to win at home and hope for a split on the road in the games with the top teams. It seems, however, that the eventual champion will have to "win his own ball game", for in a tight league with a short schedule, it is very precarious to depend on other teams to knock off the opposition.

On the home front, Kane is not sitting still. He has 12 forwards looking for the nine available jobs. The hot line of Ward Passi, Sonny Osborne and Steve Monteith is set, but he still juggling the other two lines.

Rookies Hank Monteith and Don Fuller, who started off the season in great style, have both cooled off somewhat, especially Monteith who is having trouble getting untracked. Kane has been trying to let the rookie play out to the slump, but the restless coach has ready reserves waiting eagerly in the wings. tentative all season, and with the return of Butch McGee, who injured a leg, and the appearance of newcomer Doug Jones from University College of the Interfac league, there may be further changes. Jones is expected to dress for Friday's game against Queen's, in place of absent Stuart McNeil.

STRAY SHOTS: Blues blanked Queen's 6-0 in their first encounter in December. Newcomer Gary Aitken will start in goal Friday. . . . The game will start at 7 p.m. instead of the regular 8 p.m. starting time.

The world is too much with us, late and soon.

SAC under fire next week

There may be fireworks next week, former Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly (III Law) said last night.

He was referring to the university committee hearings on the SAC's activities. Kelly is a member of the committee whose function is to provide the SAC with material for future planning as to the role that the SAC is going to play in the student body and with the university administration.

Invitations to submit statements were sent to all campus clubs and to members of the faculty. Indicating disappointment in the lack of reply to this invitation by members of the faculty, committee secretary Don Rogers said:

"We realize how busy the faculties are but we really would like to hear from them. If they would like to take an extra few weeks to make a written submission it would be greatly appreciated," Kelly said. "If the Warden of Hart House chooses to appear we will ask him what he thinks the role of Hart House vis a vis the central student government is or what it should be. It's probably too much to expect, but if Robertson Davies chooses to appear we will ask him what his ideas are for expanded graduate residences and what the SAC can do to promote such residences."

"There is always a superabundance of people on campus who criticize the SAC but there seems to be a dearth of people to offer intelligent suggestions," Rogers said.

All members of the college councils have been invited and the present SAC members will be asked to explain the nature of their jobs and to put forward any recommendations they have for changing them.

In the event that any of the disclosures might be of a confidential nature the committee might go into closed session, Kelly said.

Personal invitations will also be sent to some of the leading campus administrators.

Everyone is invited to submit his ideas but is asked to announce his intention to do so before 2 p.m. today by leaving his name at the SAC office.

Submissions may be either written or oral and those submitting the idea will then be cross-examined by members of the committee.

NDP opposition flays Liberals for Model Parliament plans

The Model Parliament resolutions released by the Liberal government last night have drawn strong criticism from the New Democratic Party opposition.

The resolutions, on Confederation and economics, were described by opposition leader Mary Brewin (III Trin) as "a farce."

External affairs house leader Mike Levine (II UC) defended the draft of the resolutions as "exceptionally vague for a very good reason."

"We are trying to stimulate discussion of our resolution, which is not a bill. It just demarcates borders of discussion. The speech from the throne will be more specific and will encourage discussion from both sides of the house," Levine said.

Miss Brewin said earlier that the resolutions were "in general terms, giving few specific proposals, and not even providing a basis for good debate. They sound like an election platform, not a proposal worthy of consideration by a parliament."

The confederation resolution calls for "a federal-provincial conference, with plenary power, to be convened immediately to rewrite the Canadian constitution. . ."

Levine indicated the speech would propose a federal-provincial conference that would draft a "Canada act." The conference would be the only constitutional way to allow amendment to the British North America Act, and the amendment would be embodied in the Canada act, a statute of amendment.

The act would be introduced in the house as a bill.

"We want discussion on whether or not the BNA Act should be re-written. We hope to get some discussion on general principles first, before we make specific proposals," Levine said.

"The parties will line up on specifics soon enough. Specifics limit debate, and we feel it is better to begin with general principles, which don't force either adherence to or rejection of the resolution right away."

He said the underlying purpose of the vague resolutions was to eliminate parliamentary red tape and procedural roadblocks.

A SAC ruling specifies that a government bill can be debated while the government cannot fall, since non-confidence motions are out-of-order.

"Our new position has very little to do with the tone of our resolutions, this year. We felt the resolutions of the past were too specific and thus could not be upheld in Parliament."

Asked to explain the term "co-operative federalism" used in the Confederation resolution, Levine said the term was "very hard to define" except in a "relational sense."

He said it did not mean a type of federal control over "little-boy provinces" such as is feared by Quebec.

Co-op prods SAC into action; may set up second credit union

By DON SMITH
Varsity SAC Reporter

Students' Administrative council President Doug Ward announced at the SAC general meeting Wednesday night that he intends to conduct a survey into the possibility of the council's chartering itself or a subordinate body as a credit union.

He said the move was prompted by the action of Campus Co-operative Residence Inc., which during December took out a credit union charter.

Such a union Ward explained after the meeting, would allow students to bank at an institution which had only their interests at heart and which could use its capital for student activities.

Ward also asked all council members to start thinking about people who could succeed them on next year's council, and said that he would like to interview these people.

"You have spent something like $2,000 on me this year, and this has involved a lot of study, work, travelling, and talking with people in the U. S. and Canada. One way you can get full value for your money is to give me an opportunity to pass on some of what I have learned."

The short and relatively calm meeting which began the new year reflected the absence of any burning issue on the campus this month.

Perhaps the most lively debate arose from a motion by Dave Beatty (III Trin) that a letter be sent to the Engineering Society notifying them of their lack of representation at the meeting and partial representation at the previous meeting.

Although Beatty stated that his only purpose was to keep the constituent councils informed, several other members felt that it would be construed as a criticism of the Engineering Society and its representatives.

A compromise was reached when Beatty agreed to change his motion to include all councils not represented at the meeting or at future meetings, and this motion was quickly passed.

A profit-sharing proposal from the staff of the All-Varsity Revue met almost unanimous opposition from council.

The AVR people asked that 45 per cent of any profit from the show be distributed as honoraria to certain key members of the production staff.

Council feared that any such arrangement might set a precedent of payment for student participation in SAC activities, and consequently voted to reject the proposal.

Other measures voted through with little debate: A loan of $150 to the International Students' Council to cover expenses of the International Students Festival; the renting of a dictaphone recorder for the SAC executive assistant on a two-month trial basis; and the sending of a delegate to the Toronto Labor Congress on Human Rights.

The Brothers Four are the headline attraction at this year's Winter Carnival Show at Varsity Arena.

Revise chariot race rules

"The Chariot Race is a race, not a slaughter," said Don Cunningham (1V Dents), president of the Blue and White Society at their last meeting Tuesday, "and it has gone back into Winter Carnival plans only on the condition that the students treat it as such."

The race for the trophy will be at 12:30 p.m., Feb. 1, on the main campus, and various rule changes have been made to prevent last years fighting incidents.

The revised rules (below) should create a lot of fun in the race itself:

1. There must be one rider, female, on each chariot and this rider must remain on the chariot throughout the race;
2. Each chariot will be pulled by only six students;
3. No blockers or any other interference will be allowed;

4. Each vehicle must have two wheels not less than 15 inches in diameter. These wheels must be in contact with the ground at all times;

5. The rider must wear some kind of costume incorporating the college of faculty colors;

6. The chariots and riders will make four complete laps of the designated course on front campus;

7. Pullers may be changed once each lap at a designated point;

8. All projecting surfaces — and these must be as few as possible — must be well padded;

9. All riders must wear protective head gear. (Football helmets, crash helmets, hard hats etc.).

Unneed UTsville snowise

Slag heaps or dunghills? Just what are those mysterious greasy-black piles desecrating the campus of late?

It's not really garbage which has been dumped all around the circumference of the front campus, the back campus, and all over the flagpole lawn in front of Hart House. According to the university's building department, it's simply snow.

Like the city department of works and the Ontario department of highways, the university department was crippled by the pre-Christmas onslaught of snow. Since the city was unable to allow the university any space to dump the snow, whatever was cleared off the university's parking lots, roads, and sidewalks had to be dumped on campus land.

HH photo contest opens

The annual Hart House exhibition of photographs by members opens for two weeks Jan. 17. Deadline for entries is next Tuesday.

The contest, open to all House members, graduate and undergraduate, awards trophies in two divisions, junior and senior.

The K. B. Jackson award, named for the first chairman of the House camera committee, goes to entrants submitting black and white prints for the first time. The senior award, the A. F. Coventry award, goes to the best entry by a member who has already won the junior award or two honorable mentions. Mr. Coventry was chairman of the committee for 20 years.

Prize trophy for competition is the Karsh trophy, awarded for the best photo depicting campus life and activities.

Since 1958, the Bev Best award has gone to the member submitting the best photographic essay of from three to eight pictures. Best, a past exhibitor, will be a judge for this year's show.

Other judges are J. B. Walker of The Telegram and John Beveridge, past chairman of the Toronto Camera Club. An automatic voting machine whereby judges rate each entry rules out judges' conferring.

Canadians look backwards with 'anchor for compass'

Dr. Marcus Long, philosophy professor at the University of Toronto, told the Electric Club of Toronto Wednesday that too many English-speaking Canadians are more in love with England than with Canada, and advocates of separate nationality for Quebec are more in love with their French past.

"In the early days Canada was an unwanted child. The French became Canadians because France deserted them, and the English were Canadians because Britain was not very enthusiastic about Upper Canada. The Canadian habit of looking back into history is futile — like using an anchor for a compass."

He went on to say that the two-nation theory was contrary to the British North America Act, which insisted on a strong central government which was essential in an age of mass production and marketing for decisive action on a national scale.

"The St. Lawrence River is an international seaway," he declared, "and to have a foreign power astride this waterway would inevitably lead to hostility and violence." He pointed to Cyprus as a warning of what might happen.

"The Union Jack," he continued "is a reminder of defeat for one-third of Canadians. Canadians would do better to build a flag of their own."

Changing radio station CJBC to French was "a small gesture of goodwill to French-speaking Canadians," he said, and would be a "small price to pay out French-speaking friends."

Students face jail terms

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. (Special)—Three Indiana University students, charged last May with violating the Indiana anti-communism statute, now face five-year prison sentences.

Leaders of the Bloomington, Indiana branch of the Young Socialist Alliance, Tom Morgan, Ralph Levitt and Jim Bingham, were charged following their attendance at a YSA meeting.

Leroy McRae, national YSA secretary, told this meeting that he felt Negroes in the Mississippi Delta region could not secure equal rights by of the anti-communist statute, which makes it a crime to advocate the violent over-violent methods.

Shortly following the indictment of three students, the Committee to Aid the Bloomington Students was formed. Supported by the National Students' Association of the U.S., the Committee has recently appealed for aid from the Canadian university community.

True to our expectations, Wednesday's Students' Administrative Council meeting turned out to be one of the duller in history.

With the exception of a vociferous 15-minute debate on the relative merits of copy machines and dictaphones, the meeting consisted of silent rubber-stamping of motions and reports.

A brief flurry of activity arose over a motion to have college and faculty councils notified if their SAC representatives were absent from SAC meetings.

A debate on one of the essential weaknesses of the SAC was avoided when a motion made near the end of the meeting was withdrawn. Dave Beatty, publications commissioner, moved that those SAC members who resign their commissions also be encouraged to resign from the SAC to "clear some of the deadwood out."

Beatty's motion approached council's greatest flaw — its members. He proposed getting rid of some of the members who refuse to bear the responsibility of a commission, but who remain on council in a passive state.

While this proposal has some merit, it would only solve a small part of the problem. It would not solve the problem of the majority of SAC members who do the relatively small amount of work involved in their respective departments, come to general meetings and silently, only raising their hands for a vote.

For some of these people, the problem is injecting a little enthusiasm into them so they will begin to think outside their own immediate interest area.

But for many of the SAC reps it is a problem of their own inadequacy as council members. They should never have been elected to council in the first place, but now that they are there the only hope is that others of their kind will not be elected in the future.

We do not dispute that there is some necessary council work which is of a purely administrative nature, and that this work is valuable. But we do take issue with the view that the sole reason these people sit on council is to represent their sectional interests and administer a department.

While council members must represent their faculties and colleges, they also must think in terms of the student body as a whole. Most of this year's SAC members are failing miserably in the latter respect.

With the exception of three or four "enlightened individuals" and the SAC special commissions, this year's council is a bit of a washout. The type of person that makes it a washout is the person who runs for council not because he has any positive ideas on student affairs — a drum to beat or a vision of student action — but because he has some sort of vague idea that he could do just as good a job as the next guy.

He is elected because he has no real opposition and because the students who vote are not presented with any ideas or alternatives.

SAC President Doug Ward struck at the core of the problem Wednesday when he stressed the importance of the coming student elections.

We have in the SAC a representative student body whose activities are limited only by the imagination and drive of its individual members.

But we will receive nothing from this body until the students with ideas, imagination and a willingness to work run for council; and until the general student body chooses people with these attributes.

2

By KEN DRUSHKA

"The board may make provision for enabling the students of the university, University College and the federated universities and federated colleges to appoint a representative committee of themselves to be chosen in such manner as shall be approved by the board, which shall be the recognized official medium of communication on behalf of such students between them and the board."

"The committee shall have the right to make communications through the president of the university to the board upon any subject in which they are or may deem themselves to be interested."

These and two other paragraphs dealing with individual rights and the powers of the colleges over students, which are found in the University of Toronto Act (1947), established the Students' Administrative Council and defined its powers.

The reference is found under the section dealing with the board of governors, officially relegating the powers of the SAC to those of an administrative nature. But the precise extent of those powers were never defined, and their definition has been a matter of administrative interpretation.

BOARD CONTROL

Until last year the activities of the SAC were practically limited to those of a secondary administrative nature. The organization, administration and issuing of funds for student activities were controlled by the representative student body. But the ultimate financial control remained with the board of governors, or on a more practical level, with the administrative vice-president, Frank Stone.

The university administration collected the SAC levy as part of the student fees, had a final say on budget reallocations and appointed the SAC's full-time business administrator and other permanent SAC staff members.

The position of council is that of a subsidiary body of the board of governors, the same as the Royal Ontario Museum, the Connaught Laboratories, the U of T Press, Hart House and 10 other university bodies.

IDEAS CHANGE

But in 1958-59 under SAC president Vince Kelly, now in III Law, the council began its fight for financial autonomy and the right to appoint its own permanent staff members.

Last year, under president Jordan Sullivan, a bigger step was taken. The business administrator, E. A. MacDonald, who was appointed by the board of governors more than 25 years ago, retired in mid-term.

Council then submitted a brief to the Caput, the university's disciplinary body, asking for important constitutional changes concerning the SAC's position.

Basically, the brief asked that the SAC be given the power to hire its own staff, and the power to decide how it will spend student funds.

"Rather, those duties and responsibilities should derive directly from the students, and indirectly from that constitution which the student body has agreed shall be the fountainhead of student action in concert."

CO-OP LETTER

The Campus Co-operative is grateful for your interest and support in the proposed Rochdale College. We regret, however, that your news report and editorial have created a confusion and a controversy where we believe none exists.

The statement in your editorial that the college may soon become a residential college is correct, but you add "within the University of Toronto". The latter is com-

Essentially, the proposed changes would remove the SAC from its subsidiary position.

Rather than a hired business administrator, appointed by the board of governors, being responsible for finances, the SAC ultimately the council president—would assume responsibility for the finances—which this year amount to a $270,000 budget.

DELAY DEVELOPS

The brief and its recommendations were accepted by the Caput. But then Frank Stone, administrative vice president—who is responsible directly to the board of governors and not to Dr. Bissell—referred the brief to the board of governors, which formed a special committee "to examine and make recommendations to the board upon the organizational structure and constitutional aspects of the SAC."

Near the end of the last academic term an SAC request for representation on this committee was rejected. This meant that the council could have no voice on discussions of proposed changes to its own constitution. At the time the secretary of the board, J. F. Brook, refused to explain why the SAC was refused representation.

The special committee was supposed to submit a report on the brief to the board in the fall, but has not done so yet. However, there is a strong possibility it may come up at the next board meeting, Jan. 23.

Meanwhile, this year's council selected R. S. Rawlings as business administrator to fill in the vacancy left by Mr. MacDonald. He has been serving as acting administrator since July, pending a board decision on the brief so that he can officially be appointed by council.

OPEN CONFLICT

Last March the situation broke into open conflict when Mr. Stone announced that the Caput decision on the brief would have to be referred to the board.

John Hayes, SAC finance commissioner, accused Mr. Stone of treating the students like infants, and constantly obstructing SAC attempts to gain financial autonomy.

He also said Mr. Stone had insulted Caput and its chairman, Dean Cecil A. Wright, of the Faculty of Law, by referring the brief.

"The board of governors would never have interfered with Caput if Mr. Stone had not opposed the amendments," Hayes said. "Their action is a clear break with tradition, contrary to the principles of academic freedom, and a slap in the face for Caput as well as the students," he stated.

But Hayes neglected to take into account the fact that Mr. Stone was placed in the awkward position of representing both the board and the SAC. He had to speak for the SAC in presenting the brief to the board, and for the board in replying to the SAC. As the watchdog of the board he quite naturally chose to refer the brief to his superiors.

Last year's council has been referred to as the shock troop in the SAC battle for autonomy. In contrast, this year's council, under President Doug Ward, is the peaceful negotiator.

(Next: This year's student-administration negotiations.)

pletely incorrect and misleading. The Campus Co-operative is applying for a charter as an independent college at the University. When it is set up as a college and proves itself in its independent state, then a liaison with the University may be considered.

There is, therefore, no controversy between Vice-President Woodside and the Campus Co-op; in fact, there is complete agreement. Vice-President Woodside in his fall address to the co-ops correctly stressed that a college must earn its way into the federated community of the University of Toronto. The Campus Co-op as Rochdale College would try to grow in stature and respect to be worthy of a formal association with the University of Toronto.

We are happy to see your paper support such a development.

Educationalization today

In this article a Toronto public school teacher criticizes modern trends in our educational system.

Remember trading cards, the ones in breakfast cereal? Well hold tight, I have shocking news to relate. If you never did part with your extra Howie Morenz for Lionel Conacher, it's too late now. Trading cards, the ones with the pictures of toothless athletes on one side and all those statistics which the class moron knew by heart on the other, no longer exist.

This sad fact came to my notice when I mistakenly obeyed an impulse to reacquaint myself with the nourishing goodness of "Soggies" (strongly endorsed by Lou Gherig on his deathbed). Somewhat unnerved by the sight and smell of the sodden contents, I nonetheless thrust my hand to the bottom left corner of the package. Unerring instinct! "Now", I thought, "I shall discover the birthplace, yards gained passing and rushing, and unemployment insurance number of Bernie Faloney."

Alas! Side one depicted a huge, ray-like creature of immense proportions. Side two read Devilfish, Ceratoptera Vampyrus, and went on to relate scientific data. Heartbroken, I rushed back to the store to examine other brands, even inferior ones which I remembered as endorsed solely by Chicago Black Hawk stars, but all to no avail. The series offered were Earthshaking Events of Canadian History, Reptilian Predators, Non-royal Offspring of the Tsung Dynasty, Famous Mathematicians and Post-Raphealite Artists. Not an athlete in the lot.

"Good Lord!" I thought, "What must recess sound like these days?" "I say there, Willie, trade me 'Champlain Viewing Hochelaga' for 'Tycho Brahe's tomb at Prague'?" What was wrong with good old hockey players? I set about finding the answer to this and other perplexing questions, interviewing children, teachers, breakfast cereal makers, and "educationists" across the country, and here are some of my findings.

First of all the prepared cereal moguls are blameless. They are simply business men who sell their products by supplying what the children want. It is the kids themselves, then, who demand trading cards as a revolt against "school larnin". Formerly it was their delight to flunk 2 plus 2 but calculate earned run averages with lightning rapidity. To-day's rebels must come out invalid on Rorschach and sociometric tests then confound their mentors by quoting Bode's Law or answering in Etruscan. The new trading cards are an indication that knowledge has never before been held in such high regard by the children; never have they wanted, that is lacked, so much.

Why? A large measure of the credit must be apportioned to the progressive education movement. This philosophy, known to its professional initiates as dialectical educationalizationism takes its thesis from Rousseau's naturalism, its antithesis from Dewey's pragmatism, and emerges in synthesis as the Canadian Junior Red Cross Bulletin.

As outlined by Dewey in Democracy in Education the progressive teacher's task was clear. At the beginning of class a youngster called Johnny would stand up and ask, for instance, "Hey teacher, what is pi?" The progressive teacher would respond, "Well, Johnny, that's a good question. This morning let's divide into little study groups and find out just what pi is." The class would duly dissolve itself into committees: committee for the whole number, committee for the first decimal place, committee for the second place of decimals, etc. Later the convenors would report, disputes would be settled by democratic referenda, and the class would wait breathlessly for Johnny's next question ("Hey, teacher, who was Julius Caesar?")

Well, much as we revere him, Dewey was occasionally in error. That he was in this case was quickly demonstrated by a thorough study of children from all 27 sociometric strata. It was shown that after 10 years of progressive education not one child had seen fit to ask "What is pi?" or "Who was Julius Caesar?" or any vaguely related question. It was a moment of peril. Education was coming to a standstill.

There next occurred the most dramatic breakthrough in the history of education since the plucking of the first birch rod by Theasos in 587

B.C. Credit for the discovery is impossible to assign. It seems to have been made by scores of education alization-rate its import was this. If at any time in democratic society, the citizens of tomorrow unaniously choose to ignore arithmetic, spelling, reading history and all such relics of the past, can we do anything but harm by insisting upon them? Should we not discard these medieval disciplines and stress instead those whose importance has been demonstrated beyond a shadow of a doubt by their popularity among the students? To wit sports, crafts, music, art, Junior Red Cross, driver education, basket weaving, and such.

Having laid low the old learning, the modern theorists proceeded to obtain astonishing trade in values for the old crocks as they choked and sputtered onto the lot. Reading and grammar, for instance were miraculously parleyed into a shiny heavy-chromed vehicle labelled "language arts" with massive twin tailfins "written communication" and "oral communication". Physical training, a trim, powerful jeep but utterly lacking refinements (noisy engine, loud hooter, no shock absorbers), made the down payment on that sleek, comfortable, velvet-upholstered model: "physical education".

The next step, according to Dewey & Co. Unltd., was to ensure that education met the "needs and wants" of the child. The sociologists to whom the educational ball had just been passed were at first (candidly) puzzled as they had always held themselves to be objective scientists working towards no particular goal, confining their flashy broken field running to the descriptive field. They knew what was average, not what was right. Then one happy day a team of sociologists discovered that if you substituted the word "norm" for the word "need" your educationalizationistic problems were solved. The team leapt ecstatically from their Turkish bath and, heedless, flew naked through the streets of New York screaming: "What every child needs and wants is to be average."

Educationalization

This edict has supplied guidance and inspiration to educators ever since. One result here in Ontario is that the Ontario Department of Education gives one course in "Special Education" for teachers of very bright and very dull pupils. For, after all, do they not have a common objective?

We are blessed, then, with a new religion. And who are the priests, the guardians of the now established system? To find them we must visit one of the temples of progressivism, the teachers' colleges. Here we meet the "masters" of various fields: educational psychologists, school management experts, "methodologists," and others. We are impressed by their youth, their easy confidence, their sartorial elegance.

If we come in the form of youthful initiates to the cult we are somewhat disappointed by the furnishings of the inner tabernacle. Can these be textbooks? Is that a lectern? But we thought we were going to separate into workshops and have discussions. Ah well, dutifully we take dictation against the evil day when we must face the true/false tests.

Then, slowly, our initial resentment fades as we recognize, glowing faintly above their heads, our masters' haloes of martyrdom! Lecturing in this way these masters, these pure souls, have voluntarily uprooted themselves from the progressive classrooms they so dearly loved. Gone forever for them are word recognition, needs and wants, arithmetic readiness, sibling rivalry, permissive discipline, and the myriad other aspects of elementary teaching of which they speak so wistfully. Oh glorious sacrifice!

Fairness is the keynote of the new teachers' colleges. In the bad old days of normal schools an aspiring teacher might be failed on a lesson because he didn't know his subject matter or lost control of the class. Grading today is on a broader scale. Thus 10 marks lost for one of the above reasons can be easily recouped under "neatness of lesson plan" or "correctness of dress". The modern student soon learns to vary his approach and not dwell needlessly on aspects unduly emphasized by the old regime.

Nowadays the teachers of teachers are at some pains to stress the importance of "gimmicks". If this word has nasty associations for you remember, please, that this is the 20th century. The modern educator does not scorn the methods or the terminology of the car lot salesman. Yes, gimmicks are the thing: traditional gimmicks such as films and filmstrips, and supermodern gimmicks which are as many and as varied as the supermodern teachers who employ them. To-day, stress the teachers' college masters, no lesson is complete without at least one gimmick. In fact, the more the gimmicks the better the lesson. This useful axiom is readily comprehended by all teachers' college students, even those who spent three years in Grade 12. Thus the progressive educationists are rapidly superannuating those hated symbols of the old system: pencils, pens, notebooks, textbooks, and minds.

Certain critics have recently been examining the school system and finding fault. Invariably these have been laymen who did not even know where to look, let alone what to find. They have been prying into the schools themselves and the minds of the children who attend them. Any professional educationist could have told them to proceed, in fact, straight to that extraordinary font of intellect, Toronto's own Education Centre. Here again we meet men who have abandoned the past for the progressive classroom in order to . . . to . . . well, anyhow they have been a sacrifice. Sometimes in moments of blackest despair, they rally pathetically to comfort each other with the following song:

O, half the wood is walnut and the other half is teak, Of slate and chalk and beaverboard we never, ever speak, The desks are real mahogany, the rugs are broadloom all, Gee, this is our Valhalla, if from grace we do not fall.

The rooms are air conditioned here; we surely are well kept, Our minds have been conditioned too, so we are all in step, We every one sport crew cuts for we all are bright young men, And we'll be at the top one day; we cannot tell you when.

Our eyes have seen the glory of the building of the board,

We have trampled competition, and we would not be ignored,

As progressives we're established, and we'll surely get ahead

At the Education Centre, formerly the Board of Ed.

In memoriam

By ROBERT M. STEWART

I knew Roly Pack as the director of the Hart House Glee Club. On several occasions I heard concerts of the Rowland Pack Singers, but only once heard him play the cello. In recital and in rehearsal his musicianship was constant. He was a beautiful man and he was a beautiful musician.

Directing a university glee club of raw-throated young men is not easy. But with an unflinching taste and a steadfast love for music and for the makers of music, he created a chorus that made music.

There was often the criticism that the Glee Club did not make enough sound. But untrained voices become harsh when extended. Noise was never substituted for intensity of tone and purity of expression. Ragged edges appeared because precision was never allowed to dull feeling.

Someone remarked after a Tri-University concert a few years ago that the two visiting clubs compared to the Hart House Glee Club as beer and pretzels to a fine aged wine.

Roly Pack was a shy man, awkward with students, but perfectly at home with music. If we sometimes found it difficult to talk to him at supper or in the halls of Hart House (although as we found on long bus trips to the United States he and we would lose our nervousness with the chance to sit and talk unhurried), we had no difficulty when he communicated his unbounded joy of music to us.

I think he got beautiful music from us. He did from the small group which bore his name. And now this music has been stopped.

Those of us who knew him and loved him feel frustrated.

New year brings flood of art shows

By PAUL RUSSELL

The new year is off to a smash start this week with all the major galleries vying for the public eye with really stunning shows.

Of course, the most publicized exhibition is the Picasso and Man collection which has its premiere tonight at the Art Gallery of Toronto. Major works by the great Spaniard, Pablo Picasso, have been collected from all over the world for this show. It runs in Toronto for five weeks, then goes to Montreal.

Picasso has been the most controversial artist of this century. Many feel he is the greatest of our time. He is certainly the most varied. No other artist of the twentieth century has passed through so many phases of development and introduced so many major innovations to European art. He is always lively, always imaginative. Humanity in all its facets and moods has always been his major theme. In this alone he has been almost consistent, whether it is in a work as personal as a portrait of a mistress or as general a theme as the human tragedy caused by war in Guernica.

The Picasso and Man exhibition is probably the major museum exhibition of this decade for North America. Certainly it is the most ambitious programme that upon. It is an exhibition that the A. G. T. has embarked must not be missed.

At the David Mirvish Gallery another Spaniard takes the spotlight. It is the first time Jose Ortega's work has appeared in Toronto and this writer hopes to see more in the future.

Ortega paints the people of Spain — the peasants cultivating the fields, backs bent and resolute; the mother with her child; the village folk dancing in the streets. Through his deft brush strokes, human figures take on bird and animal forms, a crouching figure is the white triangle dancing on a black surface. The pathos in his figure studies — particularly that of the husband and wife with their child — has a profundity and universality which recall the early figure drawings of Ortega's friend, Pablo Picasso.

The exhibition consists of watercolour drawings, mainly in black and white, some lithographs and some etchings, and continues until January 26th.

Last Monday, an exhibition of Contemporary Polish Graphic Art opened the new year for the Hart House Gallery. The works on exhibit "are far removed from naturalistic representation, but they are not too often purely abstract. The majority of artists experiment with the object, exploiting a wide range of approaches — up to the limits of semantic allusions and poetical metaphors."

Again the pieces are almost completely in black and white. It is interesting to compare these works with those seen in the American Graphics Exhibition which just left the Central Library before Christmas. The Poles certainly do not have the sophistication of the Americans, but they make up for it with sincerity and sheer emotional power.

This exhibition continues until January 26th.

O, Woe is me

By RAVI GUPTA

Not everybody consciously decide to live rather than not live. Most of us just exist. It seems natural that the minority which chooses to live would be interested in finding out the best way of living — best according to their own judgement and experience. Of course. And, apparently, the way one wants to live depends on what one understands life to be. Immediately, difficult questions like: "What is life?" and "Who am I?" arise. Only to the extent to which they help an individual find answers to such questions do philosophy and religion have any meaning. Otherwise, they can be nothing but mere word-games and enslaving afflictions.

Most of us come across these questions at one time or another and with varying intensity. But, most of us manage, somehow, to keep these at a level where the answers don't really matter. They don't change our lives in any significant manner. However, for some of us, at least, the answers are very important since the questions are not asked for mere intellectual exercise.

Faced with these questions, many people try to ignore them by declaring these to be meaningless or hopeless. Then there are the "faithfuls" who regard the distributing occurrence of these questions as visitations of the devil trying to divert them from the clear path of their religions. Their acceptance is final and they do not want to entertain doubt.

There are others whose rejection is final; they do not entertain the possibility of any meaning or cause which is not immediately clear to them. Their rejection gives them a definite freedom of action. Then there are those who are not bound by any external systems of theology or philosophy, and are free to decide their own actions and assume full responsibility; but they acknowledge that they do not know all there is to know about the subject and they ceaselessly strive for a better understanding.

This understanding can hardly be completely rational.

There cannot be any public — logical and reasonable — solutions to these questions since the enquiry is about the very ground of rationality, intellect and life. It is only in this sense that one can interpret St. Augustine's reply to the question: "What was God doing before He created Heaven and Earth?" The saint replied: "He was creating Hell for the over curious."

The great Buddha also refused to answer questions similar to the one above, since there are no rationally intelligible answers to such questions. However, one cannot deny the reality of the anguish experienced by an individual who is struck by the apparent finitude, both in time and space, of his existence, and by the lack of awareness of any purpose for all his actions in this world. The endless, and frequently incompatible, creeds, dogmas and systems lose all meaning, for there seems to be no reason for faith and no hope of intellectual understanding.

All one can admit and hope is to experience, understanding — call it "higher reality", if you wish. To this experience one simply assents. In the face of this, most established religions, with their promises of mass salvation by means of mere acceptance of a set of certain formulas, appear rather strangely anachronistic.

However, at best, this is only one point of view. There will be other view-points presented in the series "Some Aspects of Religion," organised by FROS, starting today at 1 p.m. in the Graduate Students' Union. Interested students may find this series to be stimulating.

Group Captain G. R. Truemner, AFC. CD*

Group Captain G. R. Truemner, AFC, CD of Ottawa. Director of Personnel Manning at Air Force Headquarters, was born at Arthur, Ont., in 1920. A graduate of the Arthur High School he joined the RCAF in 1940.

G/C Truemner took his pilot training at Viridien and Dauphin, Manitoba. After receiving his wings, he became a flying instructor and during the Second World War served in instructional and supervisory capacities with flying schools at Hogersville-Kingston and Trenton, Ont. In 1946 he was transferred to RCAF Station Toronto where he was Chief Administrative Officer until his transfer in October, 1947 to the staff of the School of Service Management at Trenton, Ont.

After completing the RCAF Staff College in June, 1951, he remained as a member of the Directing Staff until September, 1954. During this period G/C Truemner also attended the USAF Air-Ground Operations School in North Carolina and the University of Western Ontario for a summer course in management.

Following his tour of Staff College G/C Truemner was appointed Officer Commanding, 1 Flying Training School at Centennial, Ont., a position he held until the fall of 1958 when he was posted to the National Defence College at Kingston.

Upon graduation from National Defence College G/C Truemner was transferred to Ottawa to assume his present position at AFHQ.

Don't give up your seat

By MICHAEL BROOKS

James Baldwin's The Fire Next Time is at once autobiography and polemic, both the self-analysis of a highly sensitive Negro mind and a fierce critique of the American soul. Above all, it is a store-front church-meeting in miniature, beginning with a cry of despair, moving to a confession of sin, and ending with the ageless injunction to love.

It is the constant pressure of suppressed violence that makes the essay so shocking, and perhaps accounts for its long stay on the best-seller lists. The intent is not merely to shock, however, and the violence is intrinsic to a temperament struggling to define the terms of its own existence against the pressure of hatred and caricature which would arrest it at birth.

The essay first appeared in The New Yorker under the revealing title "Letter From A Region of my Mind." I do not think this means that there are other ideas, other moods which Baldwin might have presented if he wished. The power of the essay is lost if we do not recognize its desperate honesty. By the original title, Baldwin merely acknowledges that there are other regions which he has not yet explored, mental countries of which he is not yet aware. If the work of every Negro writer begins in slavery, Baldwin is aware that until he wholly knows himself he will not be wholly free.

If this is so, if the essay chiefly presents a mind testifying to its own existence apart from all stereotypes, then the logical validity of its learning much from these outcries.

Yet for all his passionate over statement, perhaps because of it, Baldwin testifies to some central truths about the racial conflict that may yet destroy America. Nowhere is he more enlightening than in describing the terrible extent of white domination over the Negro psyche.

This power is not necessarily economic and is not, in various arguments is of minor importance. Baldwin's assertions are often too emotional to be really convincing. "So much for state's rights," he snaps after telling the legend of the six-year-old Elijah Muhammed seeing his father lynched. Did white G. I.'s tell Europeans that the Negro was 'sub-human'? Then "so much for the white American male's sexual security." One may be highly dubious about both subjects without intent at least, necessarily malicious. The Negro loses his freedom not primarily when he is unemployed or denied the right to vote, but when he submits to an alien conception of his own personality.

In an earlier essay, Baldwin mentioned that his father had lived and died without realizing that he was, physically, a beautiful man. One need only recall the anxious (continued on page 12)

A sexual swan

By Frederick C. Crewe; E. P. Dutton; 150 pp; $3.75

By BILL HAWKINS

The absurd objects of some of contemporary academic criticism are exceeded in triviality only by the asinine criticism itself. Professor-critic (E. M. Forster: The Perils of Humanism) Crewe satirically illustrates this sufficiently obvious fact in The Pooh Perplex, an amusing collection of pseudo-critiques of A. A. Milne's Christopher Robin books.

Typical of his amusing, though neither original nor particularly constructive attitude, is Crewe's prefatory explanation of his "freshman casebook":

"When your instructor has finished showing you how each of these essays contradicts the others, you will be likely to say with jesting Pilate 'What is truth?' The answer is not easy to seek out, but with the question always in mind you will find much ineffectual excitement in your four-year period as an undergraduate; and if at the end of that time you have not accepted some halfway answer or given up the quest, you can pass on to graduate school, becoming more and more broadminded as time goes by.

Take that, Academic.

There follow the views of a dozen critics, of various persuasions, on the Pooh stories. Not that the reader who is not blessed with a familiarity with current critical attitudes will find this arthology unintelligible; everyone will surely "get it", especially if he tries the "Questions and Study Projects" Crewe has helpfully included after each critique

Take, for example, Martin Temporalis' article, "A Bourgeois Writer's Proletarian Fables" (written in 1939 before Temporalis saw the light and became publisher and editor of the Jackson White Democrat and was commended by a Committee of the U. S. Senate for turning over his address book from the 1930's):

"...The world of Pooh, no less than that of the 'idealistic' bourgeois pacifist Milne, is a world of sheer animalism, where the inhuman bestiality of the 'free' market has full sway. In this unconsciously revealing portrait of capitalism, we glimpse not only the sordidness of wage-slavery but also the possibility of a better life-of a forth-coming heroic revolution of oppressed peoples establishing free democratic socialist communes of brotherly peace-loving workers who will march side by side down the collective road to prosperity and equality for all — suitable reading for progressive children throughout the world.

Crewe prudently suggests that, "Teachers may accompany their selection with an extra-credit outside reading assignment of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover's Masters of Deceit."

Or take Myron Masterton, an "angry young man" these past twenty years, whose "Poisoned Paradise: the Underside of Pooh" reveals, to the consternation of "Four-eyed old professors and mooning Moon", the salacious vulgarity of Milne who could write in When We Were Very Young,

And there I saw a white swan make Another white swan in the lake.

or
"God bless Mummy, I know that's right Wasn't it fun in the bath tonight."

Masterton finds demonstrated here the self-demonstration from maturity of post-Shakespearean English literature a "fascinating, rewarding process to watch-particularly for myself, a simple, milk-fed boy of the Mesas, just glad to be a vigorous American critic in the middle of the twentieth century!"

Vigorous and American indeed, and as ridiculous, Crewe suggests, as one of the newest critics on the scene, Harvey C. Window, whose criticism

The fatal mistake ... is the confusion of Milne the writer with Milne the narrator, and of Christopher Robin the listener with Christopher Robin the character. They are not two personages but four, and no elementary understanding of Pooh is possible without this realization. is as far from true criticism as the pedantic "Prolegomena to Any Further Study of Winnie-the Pooh by Smedley Force who cannot ...easily forget the standards of Manly, Skeat, Kittredge, Chambers and Greg (and who) can recall times when it was still conceivable that a man might be both a scholar and, believe it or not, a gentleman!

And what IS true criticism? "That", Crewe would probably reply, "is like asking, 'What is truth?' and be answer is not easy to seek out."

The answer will not be found or suggested in The Pooh Perplex.

wkr
writes

Had it been fired ?

He took a deep breath of cold North Bay air.

His lungs didn't burn out.

He drained a glass of milk.

His legs didn't wither.

So Flt. Lt. Jeremiah Sned of the United States Air Force was forced to admit that somehow a Bomarc missile had been stolen from its launching platform.

His superior cabled Washington. Eleven minutes later 40 planeloads of Federal Bureau of Investigations men touched down at North Bay.

Six minutes later all persons considered possible subversives were clapped in irons. Quick floggings routed out further Communists, including the surprising total of seven youngsters who all admitted owning Bob Dylan records.

A widespread search for a CUCND beatnik carrying a guitar case was begun.

"She has long blonde hair and was wearing one of those funny buttons that looks like a thalidomide Saint," J. Edgar Hoover announced to a press conference of 400 reporters.

FBI HATES MUSIC

"We suspect the guitar case contains the missing Boinarc."

But this flurry of investigative activity ended as suddenly as it had begun.

A tall Canadian wearing a stetson ambled to the microphone and said:

"Hold it.

"This is a common, ordinary theft folks, and I as police chief of North Bay will conduct the investigation the same as always . . .

"But we got mighty fine fishing hereabouts and there's a restaurant down the way that has mighty fine hash. If you folks want to hang around while me and my boys clean this thing up I and the Junior Chamber of Commerce will make you as welcome as possible."

Mr. Hoover wasn't very happy about the North Bay hospitality. But his staff of lawyers regretfully told him the police chief was right. American jurisdiction extends to Cuba but not to North Bay.

The FBI men and reporters drank, fished, ate, caught dysentery and slept for a week.

Hustling Jaycees hawked pennants and Japanese letter-openers with "North Bay — Canada's Front Line of Defence" printed on them.

Meanwhile Robert Welch issued a statement:

"The John Birch Society has always favored less government and more responsibility. But we cannot help feel that exceptions, such as in the case of this filthy Comsymp police chief, must be made.

"Therefore we appeal to all patriotic Canadians to fill out petitions asking Ottawa to remove this police chief by some trumped-up means or other.

WELCH AND THE MONSTERS

"He's obviously part of the same monstrous conspiracy."

But nobody listened.

The police chief and his three deputies had investigated all the FBI men and the reporters.

The police chief was just getting around to thinking about searching the bags under Mr. Hoover's eyes, when the head of the Jaycees burst excitedly into his office.

"Chief, there's big trouble down at the general store. We've run out of pencil boxes and the letter-openers and pennants are in short supply.

"I've started people engraving 'Fallout is Good For You' on the restaurant's dinner plates but we can't keep up with the tourists' demands.

"Besides, they've fished out the lakes for miles around."

The friendly, philosophical, grizzled old chief sighed, and said:

"Well . . . I reckon we'll just have to give the damn thing back."

Says Toronto 20 years behind in field of modern dancing

By BOB SOROKOLIT

The brightest new voice in the Toronto art scene says that modern architecture, painting, sculpture and literature have all progressed in the city — but not dancing.

"The standard of dance in the moderns here is very sad — 20 years behind that in New York."

The critical voice belongs to Nadia Anastasia Pavlychenko Buchan, directress of the city's newest dance school, the Pavlychenko Art of Movement Studio at 641 Yonge Street.

"Nobody in Toronto knows modern dance. Perhaps because no American company has come here to show it and let it develop."

Nadia started her school recently "because I thought I had something to contribute. But we have a long way to go," she says.

A Toronto critic has already labelled the arty 24-year-old dance instructress as: "one of superior creative gifts... with the look and elegance of a somewhat startled gazelle - coupled, one suspects, with a most ungazelle-like will of iron."

But Nadia didn't start as a dancer.

After a thorough education in Ukrainian folk arts and in dancing as a young girl, she entered the phys-ed course at McGill.

And she made history in Montreal: as a freshie, just three weeks away from her home in Saskatchewan, she became the first girl-cheerleader for previously conservative McGill. Nadia remained cheerleader for three years. She enthusiastically served on the S.A.C. and was president of women's athletics before graduating with her degree.

But it was at McGill that Nadia fell in love — with modern dance.

The free movements intrigued her: "You never dance on the toes, and just in bare feet." (Toronto's newest barefoot contessa still prefers walking this way whenever possible).

"Modern dance at present has no frills — just plain tights and a bare stage with no scenery," she says.

Her love of modern dance sent her to Europe and the Laban Art of Movement Studio in London and later to Connecticut College to work with the "big names" in moderns from New York, Martha Graham, Merce Cunningham and Louis Horst. New York critics likewise lauded her talents.

She returned to teach the dance at the University of Saskatchewan and do choreography for campus shows, besides directing an entire concert commemorating Ukrainian poet laureate Taras Shevchenko.

But when she came to Toronto she found a new love: married 29-year-old architect George Buchan; and now lives in a Wellesley-Yonge flat with custom-built futuristic furniture, a roof-top patio replete with sculptures and potted trees and a living-room ceiling papered with a blown-up map of Paris, where she originally met her husband.

Nadia taught phys-ed in a Toronto high school but quit when she found the curriculum "a waste." "It fails if after a year the girls don't even know how to carry themselves properly."

She started her studio and has become one of Toronto's best exponents of the Carl Orff system for young children. She gives them a basic foundation and lets them develop themselves creatively, draw on their own natural movements and gain confidence. A little jazz group of voices, xylophones, bells and glockenspiels gives rhythm to young dancers while another group draws impressions of the action.

Professionally, ten women phys-ed teachers are taking her classes and seven trained male dancers want to form a modern group with Nadia.

Presently, she is involved with 30 members of the U of T Ukrainian Students' Club in preparing folk dances for the annual February concert but manages to take breaks for skiing whenever possible. Still her specialty is modern dance, which according to her philosophy is a "dance of the times, it interprets the pace of the times, and is consistent with the art forms of the times."

MUSIC

By PAUL ENNIS

"Bundler to right of us, Bundler to left of us, Figaro here, Figaro there . . . But to date we are still here at the old stand, eager to say a little word of our own, and that with a vengeance."

—Fink, (editor of Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung)

A new year, David S. has departed, the Davidides disbanded, what vendetta Schumann inspired in his rival critic has ceased. Florestan and Eusebius may linger but this is Canada whose musical scene more easily assimilates Essex Ribald and Huey Philistine.

So I've got this label, "music critic," which is worth about as much as a Supreme Court order in Alabama — token recognition of certain inalienable rights. Of criticism. Anyone can be a critic, and why not? Performing — now let's see all you critics on stage, see what you can do with your right hand struck up a French horn.

Criticism is not crossing your eyes in the score and finding three wrong notes in a string accompaniment to the bombastic brass climax of a Shostakovich symphony. It is not delighting in a myriad of technical inaccuracies in a performance full of energy, exuberance, which brings about real audience emotional involvement. As Essex Ribald puts it, "technical perfection without vitality is grave music." Obviously some degree of technical competence is necessary in any performance and the ideal is the perfection of both ingredients. What is a perfect interpretation anyway? Surely there can be no one right way. Cut out interpretive diversification and music loses its emotional appeal, becomes sterile.

Music affects everyone differently. Performers, guided by the composer's instructions, place a distinctive stamp on what they do. How different is the ending of Toscanini's Brahms' First with its frenetic energy and impatience, to Stokowski's where rich full sound, more leisurely paced, keynotes each phrase. Comparisons of "better or worse" border on the absurd in such cases. For music is feeling, an emotional experience which cannot be served up mathematically (I'll have three tritones, and a minor ninth tonight, Lionel). You listen to Toscanini; you find you're really involving yourself in his interpretation. You try to discover the reasons, the feelings, behind Stokowski's ideas. You can respect them, then dislike them.

In a live performance you move with the artists, reaching their climaxes, rising and falling with their phrases, picking out themes and watching them develop. You try to let yourself be a part of them, involve yourself completely. Then it's over. You feel satisfied, exhilarated, frustrated. Often concentration is impossible. You waver; disinterested, your thoughts turn elsewhere. (See the English Horn player sucking on his reed). But when you reach the end together with the performers, with that feeling of exhilaration which you get from a superb performance, you've made it.

There are few greater experiences than the results of total involvement in an extraordinary concert (though playing in a musically successful concert beats everything). No tape, no recording, could capture the spontaneous energy and dynamic vitality of Rostropovich's performance here last month. You're there, you almost feel part of that great performance. And why? The music reached you under ideal conditions. Music that can soothe, excite, badger, annoy, inspire, and release.

Is music the ultimate escapism for lazy students? Are some so-called critics merely thwarted embittered performers who think a writer's quill is more valuable than an oboist's feather? 'Tis too sad if this be true.

Anyone, even the "critic," should approach a performance with more than a nagging curiosity. One should try to discover freshness in the standard repertoire, to give new works more hearings, wary that repetition too often breeds acceptance of mediocre works; for "good" and "bad" can be nebulous niches in the musical six-shooter.

One should crave the performance that combines the enthusiasm and curiosity of a child with the sophistication of age. For knowledge, skill and experience sparked by communicable enjoyment belong to those of genius. Men who catalyze others, as Pelletier and Bernstein can, and Walter and Reiner could, these are the great conductors. Men who discover, rediscover, each note, each phrase, who make vivid the conventional of others, as Lipatti did with Mozart, and Rubinstein does with Chopin, these are the great pianists. These is the music everyone relishes.

So you try to go fresh to each concert. # Varsity Staffers Look at Sex and the single God

By STEVE BARKER

There are those in the world who would maintain that sex is merely a copulatory relationship between males and females. This is obviously nonsense.

Sex is far more than that. Sex is the means by which we fatten ourselves for our own particular Good Friday. By this I mean that life is at the core of all human existence and as an existential expression of life and liberty, sex serves its part in the promotion of the crucifixion symbolism. According to Dr. William F. Ottoban of Rhode Island A and M in his latest book Sex and the Single God this crucifixion symbolism is in every one of us and should be there. By this he means that we all desire to be the Son of God and, as a result, there is a tendency to wish to perform miracles and die.

Perhaps some of you have never noticed, but at one time or another, you have, at least subconsciously tried to walk on water. Although this is physically impossible, and most people recognize it as such, this desire still exists and it can be seen when you tread water while you are swimming or about to drown. Notice the obvious connection between treading in water and treading on water.

Dr. Ottoban goes on to say that those who do not walk on the water have a very strong homosexual tendency since, by lacking this desire, they are conducting themselves as Mary Magdalene who, as we all know, was a woman, and a prostitute at that.

This prostitution symbolism should be obvious. Christ made only men walk on water and, it follows that if a man does not have this elemental desire to walk on water, he is associating himself with women and therefore, he is a homosexual.

An interesting sidelight to this discussion is that fact that there are types of spiders who can walk on water. From this it would seem that spiders are truly the Sons of God. However, not enough work has been done on the psychological makeup of spiders to show whether or not this is a conscious or subconscious desire on the part of the spider. If however, it were shown that this is a conscious desire, it might indicate that God is not a kindly, white bearded gentleman, but rather that he is a gigantic black spider much like the villains in the Warner Brothers movie Them.

However, assuming that Christianity and the individual's unconscious desire to become the Son of God is valid, as Dr. Ottoban suggests, then it follows that the place of sex is not as a mere copulatory act, but rather it is a sublimation of the desire to walk on water, to perform miracles and to be the Son of God, since, if we cannot act as the son of God, then we should have at least some fun on this earth.

FANNY TAKES IT...

By KENNETH GIBSON

Certainly the most curious aspect of the late republication of John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure is the absence of any controversy. With the single exception of the Richmond Hill police, the guardians of the public weal seem, like Fanny Hill, to be taking the whole thing lying down.

Now to my mind this is a remarkable thing — all the more so because Cleland's masterpiece has no reputation apart from the pornographic.

The august committee, until recently headed by Professor B. W. Jackson, which was appointed to advise the legislators on the feasibility of prosecution, has maintained an Olympian silence. Can it be they consider Fanny Hill wholesome? Or are they implying the more heretical point that a novel entirely void of anything except carnal scrimmage is as dull as Hansard?

If the latter, then their judgment is sound, for Fanny Hill is undoubtedly the clumsiest hash of coy sexuality to loom on the horizon for many years. No lusty adolescent would put with this smug book, (despite the incessant connections), for more than five minutes; it is as far away from his experience as the Courtly Love tradition—and as inexplicable.

In fact, the case in point is instructive: If we possess what Leslie Fiedler called "the most distinguished piece of pornography written in English," and it is obviously a hack job, then the whole notion of "good" pornography (scurrilous, but brilliant and profound) is bound to be a baseless fantasy. And thus the heritage of pornography—for argument say, Nashe-Sade-Cleland-Apollinaire—may turn out to be, despite its pathological fascination, a gargantuan shelf of trash, legendary only because inaccessible. The question is, whether the publication of such material is a chance worth taking, even though complete freedom would mean for the staff geniuses of the Olympia Press, Paris, and elsewhere, a licence to begin their dredging operations.

Pornography occupies an unusual position in American law; the latter tries to redeem pornography by making it difficult for books with some merit other than descriptive to be banned. It is all rather like Gladstone lecturing the trollops, but without such latitude of legislation we should be somewhat the poorer. Yet Fanny Hill, which comes closest to the ideal of prosecutable literature, has not been put to any of

An aesthetically demanding piece

By JIM LAXER

The enraged complexity between composer and his work, pointed out Prof. McNeer, should instantly engage us to cry out against some trends of modern orchestration.

The mutually incontinent demands of two-people, sex, as intimates Sartre, lends credence to the musical direction of degeneration.

A useful accumulation of strange searching engages a presupposed intrinsic value which constitutes the major mystique of the work.

Hyperbolia, on the other hand, is rarely achieved with the performance of a work such as Handelschmitt's Vulgaria especially as the third movement starts the rising and falling gemelo figures of the Moto Perpetuo.

The illogic of some of Schubert in contrast to Beethoven's inexorability is scarcely comprehensible to the untrained ears of the adolescent orchestral leader. Consequently in modern performance of these works the recitative and aria tend to disintegrate in the direction of virtuosic allegros. Hence we must oft cry halt!

Now with these truisms cleared aside we can proceed to the business at hand. Last night's performance indicated few real dynamic peaks as there was a conflict of overpulse in the trilogy of winds and strings.

It is rather unfortunate that conductor Brannovitch chose to play the prelude to the Liebesbund. The graceful fluting tended to stand out against the more ragged percussion manifestation as the aria neared its thunderous anticlimactic.

Viola, as pseudo-violin, reveals the albeit brilliant restriction which the master has ensnared the youthful performers of the thematic passage work.

Soloist Heneger Sylviano gave a graceful twittering of the fluted keys as he brought the third movement to an almost unendurable emotional pitch yet at the same time maintaining delicate enough phrasing to keep within a country-mile of the subtle undertones of the accompanying tuba.

All told last night's performance of the Pickering Junior-High second string orchestra was a delight to the semi-aesthetic ear (or two.)

All that glitters is not crap

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

With the sheer crap turned out in the entertainment world these days, I am at wit's end. Such a mess of trivial nothingness as I have seen in the last few weeks makes me want to become a hermit. The theory is that no entertainment is better than lousy entertainment.

Unfortunately, modern purveyors of the arts seem to believe in the vice versa of this statement and show us the type of garbage that I saw yesterday.

Unbelievably bad acting was coupled with distressingly tuneless songs and resulted in the most terrible piece of show business I have ever seen. How writers Smith and Westerson could do this to me I have no idea. It was torture.

Have binder - Will travel

By JIM LAXER

Bowing to the wide popular demand for a piece on the art of book binding in Ontario I have consented to set down a few of my thoughts for that most intellectual of journals, The Weekend Review.

Hiram Ankle was the first Upper-Canadian book binder. He entered this country from the Isle of Skye in 1794. Not satisfied with roughing it in the woods, Hiram settled in Kingston. Here he met the prodigy who was to make him the greatest book binder in Canadian History.

Yes Jeremiah Crankle was to help the Ankles

The plot was simple but rather interesting but was ruined by bad acting, unrealistic dialogue and direction that was too heavy-handed for the overriding lightness of the piece.

William Garbett was satisfactory in his role of the old master. But not even he could generate enough excitement to inspire the other performers. Cynthia Smithers overacted to a point where she was screaming her lines instead of whispering. Hans Ormond, as is usual with him, couldn't be heard past the first row. (I was seated in the third row and thus cannot report his acting capability.)

Camera work was too static for the big stage and the colour and composition was banal and uninspiring.

Oah! I'm sick!

all their lives. (I forgot to mention Hiram's wife Rosepettle.)

A combination of discarded Harris tweed, robin nest droppings, and parched rattle snake skin was to give Hiram the distinctive blend of ingredients needed to bind his first book.

Within a few years the Ankle book binding corporation received the following commendation from George III of England. "Seldom have I felt so bound to comment on the binding of a book."

So in this age of Canadianism, when all are looking to our national heroes for comfort and inspiration let us not forget Hiram Ankle.

...LYING DOWN

the legal tests. The precedent is perhaps dangerous: for if I wanted to debilitate the reading public to a point where almost all emotional responses could be predicted or controlled, I would begin by flooding the bookstalls with volumes like Fanny Hill; it is the least intellectual form of writing.

The official who wanted to suppress The Catcher in the Rye was a far more acute critic than those who would prevent the sale of Fanny's dithyrambs. Salinger's book is truly subversive, because it supports the adolescent's notion of himself as a sensitive, embattled soul, rightfully abusive of adult prerogative because he really understands life, Buddy. It is precisely the ideas of social, moral or political import which prove most supremely dangerous to the dictators who, like Caligula, want the public to have one neck. I think we can at present withstand a good deal of pornography.

Finally, a word or two for the novel itself: Epistolary; febrile; dazlingly euphemistic. It is really a sort of organ recital, with theme and variations.

The plot, with a bow to Moll Flanders, concerns a young country wench who gains eminence and cash as a London courtesan, and who attains at the novel's finale a reunion with her True Love, and a deservedly Blissful Life. Between the parenthesis of 15-year-old Virgin and Redeemed Maiden, Fanny describes with unflinching zeal the various sexual combats she fought, after being deserted by her first (and noble) lover. It is all rather tiresome, but for those who like this stuff, this is the kind of stuff they'll like.

What really annoys me is Peter Quennell's introduction to the novel and especially his assertion that Fanny Hill "gives us a graphic picture of its social age." He may indeed like the novel; the style may delight him, as may the character of Fanny herself—always ready for a romp with a litigant or literary critic; and the absence of coarse words may prove uplifting. But it is too heady an encomium to class the novel as a social document. (Do any of these "editors" read the manuscript?) Dear Fanny is vertical so rarely and outside scarcely not at all, that she could have glimpsed only the most fragmentary view of Georgian society. No, one cannot credit her with that sharp a reportorial eye. She could, however, have written the definitive monograph on roccoco ceilings.

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

Every clique has its own circuit, two or three rendezvous where they meet religiously, in ritualistic order. The Cafe Monaco is our first and future anchor; it is small and intimate like a many-tabled vestibule. During the hours surrounding eight o'clock, the grand shift is to the Cafe Buci at the foot of Rue Dauphine. And after midnight, one completes the triangle at the Cafe Tournon near the Luxembourg where Maurice the waiter is a brutal mixture of sadism and charm. Madame Tournon, as she is called indifferently, squats behind the bar, her hair in a severe bun above her head. There is a wonderful story about the fat Madame Tournon. During the occupation, she became the mistress of a Nazi colonel and her cafe was a popular centre for the German soldiers. When the French were liberated, and had finished congratulating themselves on their own patience, they marched to the cafe in a slight Parisian rage, shaved Madame Tournon's head, stripped her to her dumpy skin, and flogged her down Boulevard Tournon as far, they say, as Odeon. The years have treated her kindly; her hair has grown back, her weight is more relaxed, and she does a thriving business among the conquerors. She is the bitch-goddess of the lower Luxembourg and her teeth glint in the reflection of the new franc.

Moving through the circuit, one learns the subtle art of waste, like a concussion that forces the same moment to endure forever. At times, the tedium explodes in a party, or one buys some wine and gets sick in the river that carries rats and garbage through the landscape. Which leads to a singular night.

One singular night, three of us buy some wine and walk to the War Memorial fronting St. Michel. It is long past midnight, but still too early for the Cafe Tournon. A few people are jumping into the tiny urine-stained fountain of the memorial, urged by American cheers and a fine sense of Summer Tour. We walk on, over the pont St. Michel towards the Rue Rivoli. Cheryl has long splendid legs, buttoned together by the crotch of her jeans; her heart goes out to the world and drips a bit down her shirt on the way. Brynning sucks at the air like Dracula. We are wiping wine from our chins when a shadow steps in front of us, dressed awkwardly in blue dungarees and wool cap. It moves into a slot of light beneath the lamppost, a swarthy American bleeding from the eye, a large yellow bruise from cheek to jaw.

"Hey you my fellow Americans right, I'm from New York City, named Tony; gimme a hand, lend me a franc. I'm here and on my own and its tough for me, okay?"

We don't have a franc and I say let's get out of here, but Cheryl uncorks another bottle and we move into the darker part of the street. Other shadows shuffle a block away.

"I'm Tony from the army," he says and takes a swig from the bottle. "It's good to see guys from where you live; I'm nowhere so it's nice to see a face, I tell you."

When the wine is almost finished, he falls against a wall and opens the top of his shirt to let the air in. He is a sergeant in the American army and he has been AWOL for 18 years. "I can't go back," he says, "they put me in Leavenworth I go back. I gotta keep working; I clean the streets around here, see my push broom. Soonbe 20 years I been out of it."

He is bulky and his jaws bunch in pads of flesh; he tries to smile around his battered face, and as the wine works in him, his eyes turn glassy and his speech goes through a strange transition. He begins to speak in a broken, pig-english.

"One day I come home; you Tony home momma, you Tony back from the war momma; yes you be proud you Tony, he come back a sergeant of the army momma. I surprise you momma, who you think this is. This you Tony momma. Where poppa, he no like his Tony bad Tony. Run away from army bad Tony no good. No poppa I come back. I no bad Tony, you good son Tony, I come back lots of medals, I been sergeant of the army." He stands starch at attention and snaps a salute at the air. "I Tony accept you medal General; See poppa I get medal. I listen to officers, do what they say. I good boy of the army. Andrea my sister, I give her kiss from good Tony make her proud. Hello Andrea hello momma yes popa I come home to stay. Lots of medals. I good man now."

Down the street, the shadows get larger and then they are upon us and grab the wine bottle and suck down the last of it among themselves. They are all tall men, bad teeth, well-dressed. "Who are they?" I ask. Tony breaks out of his trance and watches them retreat to the other side of the street. "Queers," he says. "They look after me, I don't have money; look I ain't no queer, but I ain't got money, I gotta go along with them. They beat me up bad, see my face. They beat hell out of me, it's no good." He stands at ease. "You Tony no queer poppa; he no bad like that." He falls against the wall again, gasping for the clean air just above his head. "One day," he says, "I'm gona kill them. I promise that. They kick me around pretty good." He licks at a tear on his lip. "They do bad things you Tony momma. Terrible thing. You no look at this thing. I wipe them away sometime you see." He pushes himself from the wall and grimly shakes our hands. He does it again, then watches the four shadows move toward him. "Okay, thanks yanks," he says. We walk away up the Rue Rivoli, and he walks back to his queers who are waiting for him by the road.

Funny as a rubber crutch

By RICKY SALSBERG

There are many causes of headaches, acid indigestion, retching, and stomach sickness, such as tension, lack of sleep, too much alcohol, and tainted food. Or "Four For Texas".

Encouraged by the financial success of their almost tasteless "Sergeants 3", Frank Sinatra et al must have calculated that an entirely tasteless movie would produce infinite profits. With this in mind, they succeeded brilliantly in removing from this film anything that could possibly be found non-offensive.

Teddi Sherman and Robert Aldrich, crediting themselves with the title scriptwriters, evidently believed they were manufacturing a take-off on westerns. To this end, they clivnen a super-moronic Tale of the Old West with frequent touches of original and sparkling humour.

An orphan boy blasts a sizzling shot from his pea-shooter into the extensive butt of the matron. Goggle.

Dean Martin tries to avoid a bullet and falls into the river and gets all wet. Chortle.

A spry old widow pounds her umbrella to smithereens over the head of one the Three Stooges. Guffaw.

And the portly bank-owner belches and belches and then, having exhausted his riotous bag of tricks, he burps. Unrestrained hysteria.

Sad to, say, no one's pants fall down.

Perhaps these were not meant to be the comic scenes. Perhaps the wit escaped us in the extended brawls which must have employed a whole symphony of rhythm sticks for the sound track.

Or in the last gasps of a man with his stomach shot out, who finally expires in a paroxysm of excruciating anguish.

Or perhaps in the demise of the man who gets ground under a paddle wheel after we see the blood spurting out of a bullet wound in his forehead. One character observes at this point, "That's the end of him". A true jester. Profound too.

Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin delude themselves into the conception that they are portraying two lovable rogues. They would have been far more loveable if they too, had received a bullet in the head, preferably within the movie's first five minutes.

The other two stars are Ursula Andress, whose costumes seem to have been conceived by a former designer of plastic windmills, and Anita Ekberg's chest. Two prizes of bovine beauty for the agriculturally-minded.

In trying to comprehend the movie in all fairness, one feels at a complete loss as to the correct mental attitude to adopt (to co-ordinate with the previously-mentioned physical upsets). "Four For Texas" has no point of view and no point in viewing it.

Head for Alaska.

The woman rules the bed

By BRONWY DRAINIE

"Vitality in a woman is a blind fury of creation. She sacrifices herself to it; to you think she will hesitate to sacrifice you?"

Man and Superman G.B.S. This loaded question, posed by one of England's greatest dramatists, is wittily but devastatingly answered in Marco Ferreri's film The Conjugal Bed now playing at the Towne Cinema. The eternal struggle between man and woman, the overwhelming power of the Life Force, the desire for procreation in the female of the species, is given a lively new treatment in this often funny, but basically very tragic story.

An aging bachelor marries a beautiful young woman whose sole desire is to produce a son for her heirless family. After a couple of months of torrid love-making, the exhausted husband pleads with the priest to tell his wife that he's not as young as he used to be. But the priest is adamant in proclaiming her desire a "sacred passion" which must be respected.

Regina, the wife, insists on giving her tired mate regular hormone injections, while he wisely takes out life insurance. Finally she becomes pregnant and does an about-face in affections, refusing all his advances. Torn between passion and fatigue, the bewildered husband wastes away to nothing, and his baby daughter is christened over his newly-laid tombstone.

Competent acting, lively direction, a witty scenario and a bouncing musical score give the viewer a sense of false gaiety, until he finally catches on, to his dismay, to the point of the story. (Incidentally, we could have caught on a lot sooner if the first half of the film hadn't been mercilessly slashed by the censors to the point of being almost incoherent. When, oh when are we going to take out and bury our Anglo-Saxon prudery?)

The film is dominated by the Queen Bee (the original Italian title), played by Marina Vlady, a Russian-born actress who won the Best Actress Award at the 1963 Cannes Film Festival for her performance. Beautiful to behold, and full of the terrifying vitality that only a determined young woman can possess, she leads her dazed spouse down the path of marital bliss to physical destruction without the slightest compunction. Completely confident in her sexual prowess, she knows full well that she can survive the marriage, and has no qualms about sacrificing her ill-fated husband to the "blind fury of creation."

Here an interesting question comes up. Is Ferreri showing us a pat little take of two people, or are we generalizing too much if we assume that this is the all-embracing story of man versus woman? Surely the cases of women who kill their husbands by sex are few and far between. But if the Life Force and the need to procreate is really the strongest motive in a woman's life, isn't it likely that every woman, perhaps unconsciously, sees her husband as a means to an end, a tool to help her fulfil her natural function? Ferreri doesn't draw any definite conclusions; nor will we. But the question is one well worth considering, and The Conjugal Bed is a film well worth seeing.

REVIEW 10

Ignorant audience required

By PAUL ENNIS

At a time when the antiformal films represented by Hud, David and Lisa, America, America, and Hallelujah, The Hills are making a sincere attempt to lift America out of the cinematic depths of the 50's, yet another slick, pretentiously sexy Hollywood film has bucked this liberal trend.

Take Her She's Mine is an unfunny adaption of the reputedly clever, moderately successful Broadway play of two years ago. It assumes nearly total ignorance of college life by the film audience, tolerance of stale jokes, hackneyed situations and the unsophistication of its principal character, Frank Michaelson (James Stewart), an upper middle class lawyer and chairman of a California school board.

Michaelson is overly worried about with the awakening of sex in his 18-year-old "dish" (Sandra Dee). He follows her to an all-girl New England college where she is on a social consciousness kick. Concerned with desegregation, bomb-banning, sit-ins, clad in sweaters, placards and guitars, she dislikes nuclear warfare (noble), mimes folk songs at the Sleeping Pill (sic), and protests Henry Miller's absence from the public library (passé). "Today Henry Miller, tomorrow J. D. Salinger" is writer Nunnally Johnson's outdated excuse.

Michaelson (who is often mistaken in the film for James Stewart, get it?) defends her right to protest. He's thrown in jail. The "dish" somehow flunks out but goes to Paris on an art scholarship anyway.

Father follows again. Gets misunderstood through newspaper photographs and returns home, to escape dismissal from the school board.

James Stewart hasn't the comic touch of Cary Grant nor the understanding of Ozzie Nelson. He's best as an embarrassed frontiersman at a Paris masquerade ball. He's very good at signing autographs for his 10-year-old fans. Sandra Dee squeezes into a role which never allows her to prove she can't act. Her hair is always in place.

Audrey Meadows (Mrs. Michaelson) without that stout honeymooning bus driver is inconceivable.

That Bronx screech booming "O Ralph" seems to hang over Miss Meadows's head. Bob Denver (a beatnik) is Maynard G. Krebs all the way but his appearance can't overcome much of his dialogue.

Even Robert Morley with his five eyebrows and three double chins is a part time victim of the script. Otherwise unsinkable, he goes under when he calls James Stewart, Henry Fonda, then exemplifies the urbane, witty, sophisticated tone of the film in his query "Will you ever forget him in Gone With The Wind?"

Oddly enough, Charade is funny

By TERRY TWEED

Charade, now playing at Loew's Uptown is one of the year's better comedies. All too infrequently Hollywood combines good actors and a good script. Cary Grant and Audrey Hepburn make an excellent team.

Mr. Grant for many years has made his living as the debonaire, devil-may-care lover with a sense of humor. At 60 he is still getting the girl and no-one is surprised. This is in direct contrast to the Method boys who get the girl and the audience never knows why. Grant has 40 years experience of being the great catch for any girl, and that 40 years experience has made him a master technician, and one of the most skilled actors of the present day.

Miss Hepburn is an actress with an ease and flare to match Mr. Grant. She has made her name as the coltish ingenue who melts the calloused bachelor's heart. Roman Holiday with Gregory Peck was the beginning. Last year in Breakfast at Tiffany's, Miss Hepburn showed herself to be a deft comedienne as well as a sweet young girl.

Charade, follows the pattern of the earlier Hitchcock films. It combines wit with fright. Charade is a little stronger on the comedy, for the criminals have some funny lines as well. The suspense however is good, and never gets out of hand.

Regina Lambert (Audrey Hepburn) is suspected of hiding $250,000. Her husband and three men stole it during the war. Charles Lambert is killed by the other three when he tries to get away with the whole $250,000. Unfortunately the money has disappeared. Who has it? Miss Hepburn? Enter Mr. Grant and the truth is amusingly revealed.

There are times when Miss Hepburn has to rise above an overly coy script. Fortunately her talents are equal to it. Generally however, the lines are light-hearted, witty and delivered with panache.

Cary Grant and Audrey Hepburn together in Charade add up to an excellent comedy, an exciting murder mystery, and an off-beat love story.

Toronto Film Society forges on

By JIM KING

The University of Toronto Film Society will present seven films of unusual excellence Monday evenings January 13-February 24, 1964 at 7:30 PM in Carr Hall, St. Michael's College. Subscription membership for the entire series is $3.00.

The season opens January 13 with Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard, a baroque confrontation of the new Hollywood, in the person of a not very successful and moderately corruptible young writer (William Holden), with the old, as symbolized by Gloria Swanson, the lost star from the lost twenties with her empty swimming pool, her director turned butler (Erich von Stroheim), her delusions, and her splendid memories. Sunset Boulevard has all Wilder's cold intelligence, knowingsness, relish for details carefully observed and memorized.

Subsequent films include the Toronto premiere of Antonioni's L'Avventura; the island passage in this film with its brilliantly sustained passages established its director as a true modern artist of the cinema. Ajarito with its humor and gentle stubbornness displays the painstaking observation of a very sophisticated artist. Starring Wendy Hiller, Mary Ure and Trevor Howard, Sons and Lovers is a successful screening of D. H. Lawrence's masterpiece coupled with cine matographer Cardiff's exquisite screening.

Alexander Nevsky shows the 13th century defeat by the Russian people of the Teutonic Knights who invaded their country "disguised" as crusaders. Enactments of the battle scenes are among the greatest in cinema history. An all-time classic of epic proportions fashioned by the Soviet Union's greatest director, Sergei Eisenstein, it also contains Prokofiev's dazzling score. A true Italian comedy, Big Deal on Madonna Street boasts the superb talents of Marcello Mastroianni, Vittorio Gassman and Claudia Cardinale. Siobhan McKenna and the Abbey Players combine to give an inspired performance of Sygne's superb modern comedy, Playboy of the Western World.

MUSIC

Ozawa livens up listless TSO

By PAUL ENNIS

"So the conductor is a kind of sculptor whose element is time instead of marble; and in sculpting it, he must have a superior sense of proportion and relationship. He must judge the largest rhythms, the whole phraseology of a work. He must conquer the form of a piece not only in the sense of form as a mold, but form in its deepest sense, knowing and controlling where the music relaxes, where it begins to accumulate tension, where the greatest tension is reached, where it must ease up to gather strength for the next lap, where it unloads that strength."

Leonard Bernstein

The mastery of these intangibles makes conductors great. Seiji Ozawa, the young Japanese conductor, apprentice to Bernstein in 1962 and guest conductor with the TSO this past week, is a wonderfully gifted musician who somehow managed to make something out of a too often (in the past) listless orchestra.

Welcomed as a refreshing change from the loquacious Mr. Susskind, he was given the orchestra's respect and cooperation. The result was a performance with the best sound the orchestra has produced in ages, culminating in a controlled (for Tchaikovsky), never sentimental reading of the Fifth Symphony, where climaxes seemed all natural, never frustrated, in which (even), music overpowered schmalz in the valse movement. Because Mr. Ozawa indeed demonstrated his grasp of Bernstein's intangibles here, the Prokofiev Fifth Symphony, the concert's other major work was a disappointment.

hours that a teen-ager spends before a mirror to realize how pride in appearance and pride in self are indissolubly linked. There is a terror in the denial of beauty to a human being that far surpasses the nasty behaviour of a Mississippi judge.

This imposition of a caricature is all the more devastating, Baldwin says, because the Negro has come to accept the white view of himself. Even his religion is one which equates black with evil, and the salvation he seeks is an attempt to escape the terms of his own existence.

Baldwin traces his dilemma in his conversion to Christianity at the age of 14, and his subsequent career as a boy preacher. He looks back on these years as an attempt to escape the despair that led so many of his friends to narcotics, the bottle, or the aimless life of the street. There was no escape, however, for he was merely embracing his own self-disgust, his terrible annoyance with himself for being black. He was, in addition, acquiescing in the separation between himself and the white strangers: "...the passion which we loved the Lord was a measure of how deeply we feared and distrusted and, in the end, hated almost all strangers, always, and avoided and despised ourselves."

It is against the background of his apostasy from the store front church that he explores his mixed feelings about the

Whereas the Tchaikovsky was controlled and well-disciplined, the Prokofiev which demands a firm rhythmic base to realize its essential character, was too often unrhythmic, undisciplined, and unclear. His tempi were occasionally unsuitable. The adagio third movement was closer to an andante—its character destroyed. Themes were often lost. In the third movement the violin motive was drowned out by the second trumpet accompaniment. Often muddiness and meek string playing caused effects to be lost, notably in the beginnings of the symphony.

Mr. Ozawa leaned, cajoled, swayed, in marionette fashion, often conducting with a baton-less left hand. In climaxes he held his left hand high on one level, a la Susskind. His apparent rhythmic insecurity however showed through too often. He was too indefinite in a major cello cue in the last movement resulting in an imprecise and disunified entry.

If as Stravinsky says, "pulsation is the reality of music", Ozawa's Prokofiev was too fanciful, too empty of that unique biting humour, the almost jazzy quality which characterizes the second movement. The kind of epic sadness of the third movement and the main theme of the fourth which raises this symphony above the ordinary was never quite realized.

It is such a great work, this Prokofiev, that when the orchestra is given an opportunity to play under a conductor to whom they give themselves enthusiastically, one feels justified in wanting more out of the performance than was given. Mr. Ozawa did wonders with the Tchaikovsky, he urged a fine performance out of Toru Takemitsu's Requiem for Strings (which sounded like a Debussy Verklarte Nacht but went over like a Personna "bleep"). Why was his Prokofiev so frustrating?

Black Muslims. If his comments are disturbing, it is not so much because of what attracts him in the Muslim gospel as because of what does not.

The Muslim doctrine that all whites are devils fails to interest him not so much because it is vicious, but because it is old-hat. Muhammad merely provides divine confirmation for a view that every Harlem youth had formed by himself. The doctrine contained nothing he had not heard from storefront preachers all his life. "Never give your seat on a bus to a white woman," one had told him; "they'll never stand for one of ours."

The appeal of the Muslims is not that they repeat the old hatreds, but that they introduce a new affirmation. Hatred of the white man is a disease that can be forgiven in mid-century America, but hatred of one's self is a disease that provides no remedy. The strength of the Muslims is that they step outside the Western tradition and present the Negro with a new and startling valuation of himself.

They succeed because they seek no remedy short of conversion. They ask their followers to make themselves anew: "Elijah Muhammad has been able to do what generations of welfare workers and committees and resolutions and reports and housing projects and playgrounds have failed to do: to heal and redeem drunkards and jun-kies, to convert people who have come out of prison and to keep them out, to make men chaste and women virtuous, and to invest both the male and the female with a pride and a serenity that hang about them like an unfailing light." But at last the Muslims too are caught in the circle of despair. Their very hatred of white culture ties them to it inextricably.

When he has rejected the Harlem church and the Chicago mosque, Baldwin is left with only the Christian doctrine of love to preach.

His demand is an apocalyptic one. He asks not merely that we change our conduct, but that we transform both our souls and our social structure. It is no longer enough when white liberals offer the Negro a chance to enter the white culture on the terms of that culture. There must be a radical change in the white soul as well.

This is clear in the closing section of the essay, a spell-binding peroration in what must have been Baldwin's best pulpit style. This is the most eloquent section of the essay and in an odd way its most discouraging. This is so because the Negro demands, put forward in the spirit of the Christian gospel, have so far met with a response that would be more appropriate to Tammany Hall.

Drunks degrade folk singing

By LINDA HALVERSON

Alcohol and folk music have been associated for a number of centuries. But in recent years the demon rum is presenting a professional problem to some folk singers. Not personally (that's not our department) but professionally.

The problem comes in the form of liquor packaged in people. Noisy people. Unappreciative audiences which, for many folk singers, are the bane of the better-paying bookings — the licensed clubs, beverage rooms and restaurants.

Since most of the new crop of folk singers are born and brought up in the sheltered, protective atmosphere of coffee houses, and nourished on the encouragement of the established and the edulation of the awe-struck, they are often unprepared for the cold old world outside.

Drinking audiences unfortunately want to be entertained. Not edified or educated. They are paying enough for their evening, and this, they feel, gives them the right to be singularly unimpressed by the fact that an individual is a Folksinger (who has seen Life and all that). If they have no background of coffee-house attendance (and sometimes even if they do) respectful silence during a set is not part of the folkways of the liquor house.

The audience may talk. Or laugh. Or even bellow for "Sweet Adeline" right in the middle of "Trouble in Mind" or "All My Trials Lord".

Now there are several ways in which our friends the folk singers may choose to deal with this kind of behaviour. They can ignore it. This may be effective with the talkers (if the singer has a good loud twelve-string) but it will never satisfy the Adelins who are probably looking for attention anyway and will continue to demand it.

They can insult the audience either by talking down or making sarcastic slams at them. This may be effective with hecklers but seldom goes over with the average audience. In fact it may make them hostile or drive them out — which will do nothing to endear the singer to the management.

Or they can begin to learn some of the fundamentals of showmanship and the ability to size up and relate to an audience. Perhaps it will mean singing Sweet Adeline or at least eliminating the esoteric ballads which are not finding any responsive chords in the audience.

Essentially it means respecting the audience — and attempting to feel with them.

The folk singer who feels this is selling out may be right. But he would be showing more respect for his art if he stuck with the coffee house circuit and supplemented his income with a day job.

BACHELORS, MASTERS AND Ph.D'S IN CHEMISTRY OR CHEMICAL ENGINEERING

Chemical engineers and chemists will find that research and development at Columbia Cellulose offers unique opportunities in the fields of cellulosic chemistry to Canadian graduates at all levels.

Our Research and Development Division, soon to be relocated in a new $900,000 Research Center in Vancouver, B.C., concerns itself with scientific activities ranging from short term, highly practical developments, through applied research into longer term basic studies. For this reason, R & D is organized into four groups:

DEVELOPMENT — Development is the responsibility of the Sulphite and Kraft Groups. Both groups are concerned with the evaluation of raw materials and the improvement of our present products and processes. The Sulphite Group is concerned mainly with the chemical properties of the raw materials and products and the chemistry of the processes involved in the purification of cellulose. The Kraft Group's main concern is with the physical properties of wood fibres and the effect of processing on the physical characteristics of pulp.

APPLIED RESEARCH — Our applied research efforts are carried out in anticipation of the Company's future requirements. The general objectives of these activities are the better utilization of our forest reserves and the development of new products and processes outside our present operations.

MORE DETAILS — Brochures outlining in more detail the activities of the Research and Development Division are available at your campus employment office.

FOR INTERVIEWS — Graduating and Post Graduate students to the Ph.D. level in either Chemistry or Chemical Engineering are invited to discuss employment opportunities with senior representatives of the R&D Division on Jan. 15 & 16, 1964.

See your employment office for an appointment.

BASIC STUDIES — The Basic Studies Group is concerned with work of a longer term nature directed toward the development of information rather than products and processes. Its objective is to generate knowledge and understanding of our processes and materials, particularly in fields of scientific interest which are specific to our Company.

ANALYTICAL — A most important role in support of our Research and Development activities is fulfilled by the Analytical Group. It provides a service to the other groups in analytical testing ranging from simple gravimetric determinations to gas chromatographic and spectroscopic analyses. Its major contributions, however, lie in the investigation and development of new analytical methods pertinent to our operations.

The sound of surprise

by David Jackel

Below this column is a picture of a man playing three saxophones at once. In the bell of the tenor, ready for instant use, is a flute which is played with either mouth or nose. Also slung around the musician's neck is a whistle, blown to enliven the proceedings as the spirit moves him. Who is it? Roland Kirk, of course, and he's the best and most entertaining big band to perform in Toronto for many years.

Currently at the Friars, the blind multi-instrumentalist leads a quartet which generally functions as a back-ground to his overwhelming musical personality. The bassist is inaudible, and Horace Parlan (a good, driving pianist who once aided Charles Mingus in that personality's assault on the frontiers of jazz) takes only occasional solos which are difficult to hear because of a misplaced microphone. Unfortunately, the drummer can always be clearly heard, even when he rushes the beat on uptempo numbers.

But Kirk is the unquestioned major attraction, even for those who wander in to watch and listen with expressions of complete disbelief on their faces. Strictly speaking, he seldom plays three horns at once. There are obvious fingering problems which even Kirk can't overcome; after all, he only has two hands. For most theme statements only two instruments are used, while the third hangs in readiness nearby. Solos are generally played on one horn, although Kirk freely changes instruments in midimprovisation. Occasional blasts on the whistle are used to indicate exuberance, the end of a Kirk solo, or the fact that someone else has momentarily captured the spotlight.

For the uninitiated, Kirk plays the conventional tenor saxophone and flute, and the manzello and stritch. The manzello, a sort of unsanforized alp-horn, has a sound approximating that of the soprano sax. The stritch, which in appearance resembles a soprano sax that got out of control in the factory, actually sounds more or less like an alto. Generally the tenor can be expected to sound like a tenor, but don't count on it.

On flute Kirk produces sounds ranging from incredibly pure to incredibly dirty, and on one number this week he obtained from the instrument, by means of very unconventional tonguing, a sound not unlike that of a hip bongo-player. As if this weren't enough he also hums along (in his throat) when so inclined, and plays the whistle with his nose.

By this time you probably have the impression that Roland Kirk possesses an acutely developed sense of humor. He does indeed, and it finds an outlet not only in weird combinations of instruments, but also in his speaking and playing.

He is fond of quoting other songs (into Moritat he interpolated Basic Street and The Music Goes Round and Round), and on Tuesday night he delivered a hilarious oneman parody of a society band saxophone section. His occasional verbal humor is also off-beat. A sample introduction: "This next number is built around the prejudiced 13th, that's a chord played on the black keys or the white keys, but never on both."

But don't dismiss Kirk as merely a musician with a sense of humor and a gimmick. He also plays good jazz, jazz which is modern and at the same time strongly rooted in the rhythm and blues tradition. So hear him before he closes this weekend. Jazz and showmanship have seldom been so successfully combined.

In the flurry of praise for Tom Jones let's not forget who started him

NELLES VAN LOON

In Henry Fielding's Tom Jones, the basic passions abound with a wealth of joyful, healthful exuberance seldom exceeded in English literature before or since. Fortunately, the adaptation of the novel for the screen by writer John Osborne and director Tony Richardson remains faithful to the spirit of the book, while managing to exploit fully the resources of the motion picture.

In one important way, Tom Jones readily lends itself to presentation on the screen. The novel abounds with the techniques Fielding learned in his earlier years as a writer of comedy and farce for the 18th century stage, and contains a wealth of theatrical surprises and robust situation comedy.

Osborne's screenplay reveals a sharp eye for the high points of Fielding's comedy and a keen ear for the best of his dialogue. Richardson's direction employs a variety of techniques, including a Keystone Cops speed-up of the events at Upton, to underline the comedy with tasteful exaggeration.

However, other aspects of the novel are not so readily adaptable to the screen. As any student who has come across the book in a form other than the Highmark abridgement will realize, the novel is so long that a good deal of amusing and significant material has had to be omitted.

Nonetheless, Osborne's screenplay is admirably selective of incident. The complicated story line is kept clear, and things move with a fine sense of pace. He has also very commendably attempted to capture the intimacy between author and audience that is one of the novel's most attractive qualities. In the movie, the characters occasionally appeal directly to the audience, and more important, Osborne has provided a narrative voice to preside with a controlling wisdom and benevolence, and to interrupt Tom's "conversations" when good breeding demands, which is often.

Albert Finney as Tom is first rate. Although his performance emphasizes Tom's robust energy and adds a degree of boldness (Fielding's Jones stutters and trembles in Sophia's presence) his delicacy of expression is capable of suggesting boyish innocence in a shy twinkle of the eye. The movie's Jones doesn't learn prudence, but neither does the novel's. The movie is also lacking in Fielding's insistence that Tom really ought to learn prudence, but the loss in entertainment value is slight.

Fortunately the movie gives us a spiritual Sophia. Too many critics have seen her as an insipid paragon of virtue. The roles of Bridget Allworthy and Partridge have been collapsed and altered beyond recognition in the interests of brevity.

However Squire Allworthy is more convincing on the screen than he is in the novel. Osborne's conception of Squire Western, the ebullient Tory hunting Tory squire is straight from the pages of the book. Hugh Griffith gives an excellent performance, but it would take absolute incompetence to destroy the somehow loveable charm of Fielding's creation.

John Addison's music is a delight in itself, I must add, and moves along with a delightful 18th century bounce dressed up in 11 instrumentalations, and 20th century harmonies.

Many critics have called Tom Jones the best picture of the year. I agree. But with all the talk about the movie, I felt it might be interesting and fitting to say a few words about the man who started it all.

Irish question:

Let them eat potatoes

THE GREAT HUNGER by Cecil Woodham-Smith; Harper and Row; 1962 510 pp.; $7.75

By SEAN COWLEY

The year 1846-47 is known as the year of the Great Famine in Ireland; the famines of seven hundred years and more pale into insignificance when Black-forty-seven rears its ugly head. The staple diet of the people at the time consisted almost exclusively of potatoes; grain crops were sold to pay exorbitant rents. After seven hundred years of British rule one might be forgiven for expecting that the British Government knew and understood the Irish people.

Typical of the author's detail the work contains eighty-seven pages of references which have been obtained by direct access to libraries and museums in Toronto, New York, Dublin, London and elsewhere. There is little doubt that a thorough analysis of the years 1845-49 in Ireland has been presented in a highly objective manner. Woodham-Smith weaves a complexity of historical events and a multitude of statistical figures into pleasurable reading. This volume does not pretend to be a history of Ireland in the years surrounding 1847, neither does it qualify as a literary masterpiece but its powerfully vigorous literary style exudes an academic enlightenment seldom forthcoming in humdrum texts.

Although one could rightly say that the failure of the potato crop through the advent of blight (phytophthora infestans) was the major factor determining the course of events during this sordid period, the work shows that social conditions before, leading up to, during and after the famine of 1846-47 were determined to no small extent by the politics of the times. C.W.S. finds in a letter from C. Trevelyan (the then Assistant Secretary to the British Treasury) to Colonel Jones, "The great evil was not the physical evil of the famine, but the moral evil of the selfish, perverse and turbulent character of the people". The parts played by private organizations, politicking red tape and traits of some of the leading men of the time are examined.

In the words of G. O. O'Sullivan (Varsity Review, Nov. 8) a "cool and analytic" study has been made, and only goes to accentuate the judgement of W. Okumu (Lumumba's Congo) that "Colonialism in any shape or form always means robbery, exploitation and flouting of elementary rights of the people and their national sovereignty. Colonialism means ignorance and hunger."

Woodham-Smith goes on to say that although Trevelyan was of Celtic origin, and "his mind was full of schemes of moral and political improvement", he disapproved of and despised the Irish. He was an adamant advocate, the author notes of the fact that as was the British Government as a whole, at the time which led to disastrous consequences in the years following 1845. Trevelyan's fame was used to justify the point of view that constructive assistance in any solid form should not be given to Ireland. (i.e. private enterprise would solve the problem).

The author points out the extent to which the landlords of the time had the power of life and death over the people. At the same time she is careful to show that many landlords acted with extreme charity towards their tenants. Several chapters are taken to explain that the landlords actually paid passages for thousands of Irish to Canada, Boston and New York and that the influence of this influx of typewritten pauper Irish on these centres in the New World is visible to-day.

The writer goes to pains to show that Ireland's benefactors during this disaster included many clergymen of various denominations, an Indian tribe (a donation of $100), Queen Victoria, many business concerns and last but not least the Society of Friends.

In describing the visit of Victoria to Ireland in 1849 C.W.S. notes that the red carpet was "laid out in Cork, Coad Mile Earle and Festivities were the order of the day. The people of the city asked Victoria's permission to rename the City of Cork, Queen's Town. In Dublin the Queen and the people were mutually delighted that they had met. The allegiance of the Irish people to the crown was everywhere evident, yet the author writes "The treatment has been described as genocide." "It is difficult to justify the conduct of the British Government..." She says, concerning the English, "as a nation they have proved themselves to be capable of generosity but not where Ireland is concerned." She quotes Sydney Smith, "The moment the very name of Ireland is mentioned the English seem to bid adieu to common prudence and common sense, and to act with the barbarity of tyrants and the fatuity of idiots."

The emotional note occasionally struck serves to harmonize the work with the mood of the time creating a very readable, balanced, informative and non-the-less dispassionate presentation.

The Negro movement offers what it demands: love, and a recognition of human dignity. It is offered in return a series of bargains, the kind of minor changes in the social system that seem realistic to the professional politician.

As we survey the battlefied, from New York to Birmingham, it is hard to feel that the Tammany approach is altogether wrong.

Baldwin's solution is love. Fair enough; the only sensible Negro demands are the ultimate ones. There is something infinitely sardonic in the "practical" request for equal access to a lunch counter.

But love can be fully meaningful only when it can be fully returned, and until that day our emotions must always be a mixture of love and hate. Passive resistance and potential violence, like the threat and the promise contained in Baldwin's title, are merely two sides of a single coin.

Baldwin says that "the real reason that non-violence is considered to be a virtue in Negroes... is that white men do not want their lives, their self-image, or their property threatened." This is cynical, but not cynical enough.

One need only consider the white response to passive resistance to see what is happening. A Negro chains himself to a lamp post, consenting to be beaten and imprisoned, and the white community immediately reacts, not to a Gandhian appeal to their souls, but to the threat of a race riot. There is a sense in which they are right.

One can view the astonishing events of last summer not as an exercise in Christian love so much as a prolonged, three month race riot, one that was much too disciplined to expend its fury in a few hours of self-destruction.

A young Negro student offers love, and the white man responds not to a human being but to a cardboard caricature. The segregationist responds to an inhabitant of the jungle, the liberal to a young man who would be white "if it weren't for the color of his skin." Neither responds to the realities of the situation, examines the assumptions of his being, and makes himself anew.

It would seem that all of us, white and black, are engaged in a complex dance, one in which each dancer has not so much a partner as a cardboard caricature who is really a projection of the dancer's mind. The value of Baldwin's essays, and I do not mean to exclude the literary value, is that they remind us that behind our various caricatures there are at least the beginnings of a human personality.

FIRST SPEAKER

January 26, 1964 - 8:00 p.m.

FATHER GREGORY BAUM, O.S.A.

Born of Jewish parents in Berlin, Germany, 1923. He received his B.A. in Mathematics and Physics from McMaster University, Hamilton, in 1946 and M.A. in Mathematics at Ohio State University, U.S.A. in 1947. Joined Order of St. Augustine in 1947 and studied in Fribourg, Switzerland, 1950-59. Received Doctorate in Theology at the University of Fribourg. Since 1959, has been teaching Theology at St. Basil's Seminary and St. Michael's College in Toronto. He has recently set up a Centre of Ecumenical Studies in Toronto, and is the only Canadian and youngest members of the Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity, one of the permanent commissions set up prior to the Second Vatican Council. In the first two sessions of this Ecumenical Council, he has acted in the capacity of advisor to His Grace Archbishop Philip F. Pocock, Coadjutor Archbishop of Toronto. Father Baum is the author of three books, "That They May Be One" — a study of Papal Doctrine, "The Jews and the Gospel" — a re-examination of the New Testament, and a recently published book on Church Unity entitled "Progress and Perspectives". He is Editor of a new Paulist publication — "The Ecumenist", and a prolific writer on Church Unity and Ecumenism for various Catholic publications.

CANADA SHOCKS BIRCH BOOK STORE

By DON ROGERS

Nestled beside an inconspicuous alley near the intersection of Westwood and Wilshire boulevards in the affluent Westwood Village sector of Los Angeles, the Betsy Ross Book Shop might well appear, at first glance, to be just another run-of-the-mill book outlet.

However, while visting that metropolis last summer, I received some startling information from my host — that the Betsy Ross Book Shop was the local haunt of the John Birch Society, and that no better opportunity for meeting an honest-to-goodness, in-the-flesh John Bircher existed than dropping in to this establishment any afternoon. Not wishing to miss such a glorious chance, I resolved to risk life and limb and visit this mystic shrine of freedom.

As I walked through the door, I entered a tiny, neat, shop decorated in a quaint New England style. The most unusual feature of the shop was the several chesterfields and wicker chairs scattered about, each containing an occupant engaged in quiet, but vigorous conversation.

Feeling slightly out of place, I made myself as inconspicuous as possible by slowly proceeding around the periphery of the room, artfully dodging the sofas and chairs, and examined the wide assortment of books, booklets, pamphlets, flags, stickers, illuminated Oaths of Allegiance, framed pictures (assorted poses) of Barry Goldwater, and ornate scrolls of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. A few of the items in particular caught my eye, and forcefully made me aware of the wide range of idea and thought which was expressed by this group. Among the most prominent books in the hardcover section were those by Barry Goldwater and William F. Buckley, as well as works by non-celebrities, such as Conservatism and Mormonism.

The selection of pamphlets was even more catholic; a few of the titles on display were: Nelson Rockefeller — The International Socialist, The United Nations — A Smokescreen for Communist Aggression, Nine Men Against America, U.N. Atrocities in Katanga, How The Reds Won, and How 'Progressive' is Your School?. Bumper stickers in garish fluorescent paint screamed: "DON'T WORRY — THEY'RE STILL 90 MILES AWAY", "Au — H2O — 64", and "THE ONLY 'ISM' IS AMERICANISM". And of course there were flags: big flags, little flags, ornate flags, plain flags, expensive flags, cheap flags — but all American flags.

After my leisurely tour of the shop, I approached a plump, matronly lady seated at the desk in the corner, and engaged in serious discussion with two of the seated frequenters of the store. At this point, the most daring part of my plan, came into effect.

I introduced myself as a visitor from Canada.

I expressed great interest in the John Birch Society, especially since we did not have a comparable organization in Canada, which a result was being slowly devoured by the creeping Communist menace. I pointed out that our so-called Conservative party was really pink, and had actually, over the years, introduced such socialistic measures as public broadcasting, public hydro power, and public hospital insurance.

And if this wasn't bad enough, in Canada the Communist party was allowed to operate overtly, and even had the sheer effrontery to run candidates in our elections. Moreover, we had a democratic left-of-centre party (the NDP) which not only ran candidates, but actually elected several members quite regularly.

By now the whole room had lapsed into a shocked silence; many persons could hardly believe their ears, and many others didn't want to. In their all-consuming concern over Cuba, none of these Birchers seemed to have given Canada any thought.

From then on, the discussion moved along briskly. After answering several questions about Canada ("Capital? Population? Provinces? Eskimos? Climate? Diefenbaker?"), I steered the conversation to American affairs.

For example, my mentioning a large billboard which I saw beside the highway and which read: "Be a Super-Patriot — Impeach Earl Warren", brought about a 10-minute condemnation of the supreme court as an accessory for the Communist overthrow of the republic. For enquiring about the pamphlet on the United Nations I was rewarded with another dissertation about how the entire U.N. was permeated with Reds, and thus why the United States should get out of this body.

And so the afternoon continued. At last, I announced with great regret that I must leave, and asked for a few leaflets to take back to Canada so that I could acquaint my friends with the dangers lurking in our midst. To my delight I was given many of the above-mentioned pamphlets and leaflets absolutely free (many of them were priced from 5 cents to 25 cents), which I brought back with me to Canada.

The afternoon had flown by extremely quickly. I shook hands with the matronly lady, then with the three remaining gentlemen in the shop, wished them well, promised to spread their gospel back home in Canada, and walked away, clutching my shopping bag half-filled with the literature I had received.

What's doing in Aluminum FABRICATION?

Lots—because fabrication is an important part of Alcan's business. About 15% of our ingot production is fabricated in Canada into finished products. (The other 85% makes a vital contribution towards Canada's export trade.) In our own plants, we make semi-finished and some finished products:

- At Kingston, Ont.: (where this picture of an aluminum sheet rolling mill was taken) Sheet, plate, foil, extrusions and tubing.
- At Arvida, P.Q.: Rod for wire production and other applications, aluminum paint pigment.
- At Shawinigan, P.Q.: Wire, electrical cable, cable accessories.
- At Etobicoke, Ont.: Die castings, permanent mold castings and sand castings.
- At Vancouver, B.C.: Extrusions, rod and wire, electrical cable.

Fabrication at Alcan is a challenging business, not only for graduates in physical metallurgy and mechanical engineering, but also for those in nearly all other engineering and many science disciplines. A typical metallurgical problem might involve development work in the fabrication and heat treatment of Al-Mg alloys used in sheet plate and extrusions for road and rail transport. Whatever your specialty, you are likely to find challenging assignments at Alcan.

OUT TO AVENGE DEFEAT OF LAST YEAR

Swimmers entertain Colgate

By SHEL KRAKOFSKY

Varsity Swimming Blues host a strong team from Colgate University Saturday at 2 p.m. in Hart House pool. This will be Varsity's first test against American competition in the young season.

Blues have already made it clear they are impregnable in OQAA competition after defeating Western soundly in London before the holidays. Their task now is to prove that they can hold their own against competition from across the border.

McGill is the other team in the race for the Intercollegiate title but their chances of winning are almost non-existent with a large rookie crop to rely on.

Unless somebody drains Hart House pool for the next two months, Blues are almost assured of a win at the Intercollegiate title meet in Toronto at the end of February. U of T has won the championship for six of the last seven years.

The Colgate team poses formidable opposition, being one of the outstanding eastern United States squads. Last year they won eight of 11 meets, one of them a 61-34 thrashing of Blues in Hamilton New York.

They have nine lettermen back with this year's team and have added a red-hot rookie, freestyler Dick Arluck, who has already been touted as a future great.

Blues will have a better team than the one which lost to Colgate last year but whether they can upset the Americans is doubtful although Varsity should improve its point total.

Freestyler Bill Stuek is back with the Colgate team after an outstanding season last year which earned him All-American honours. He will oppose Toronto's Tom Verth, a former three time All-American, who holds the Colgate pool record in the 200-yard freestyle at 1:49.8 set last year.

Verth hasn't yet reached his peak this year after his late start in training because of defensive end duties with the football Blues.

Verth and Graeme Barber both attended a swimming clinic conducted in Florida over the holidays and feel they have picked up some valuable pointers to bring down their time.

BABY BUBBLES: One of Blues' coaches John Ridpath is still in Florida after attending the clinic and nobody seems to know for sure if he'll be back in time for the meet. . . . Walt Unger, a former star with Blues and now an intern at Mount Sinai hospital, took part in Blues' practice last night. . . . Kal Schneider has left the team because of academic pressures.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

UC 'Remnants' win again despite Varsity raids

By AL SCHOENBORN

University College won its fifth consecutive game in Group I interfac hockey, edging St. Mike's A, 4-2.

Rookie Howie Fluxgold, who has the unenviable task of filling the large gap left in the UC nets by the departure of Gary Aitken to the Blues, was the difference between the two clubs in Wednesday's match.

Bob Wardell, with a pair, Jody Curran and Don Lillow counted for the "Remnants", who may start signing players to contracts in order to keep them from jumping to "needy" clubs. Pat Monahan and Mike Riddell scored for the Irish.

The win moved UC into sole possession of first place, two points ahead of Vic I.

News from Group III as Trinity B has dropped out of the league. All results involving the Trinity team will be wiped out.

The game between Trin. B and Jr. SPS for Jan. 16 at 12.30 p.m. has been rescheduled as UC I vs. PHE I.

PHE II used a sixth at tacker to score the equalizer with just 31 seconds left and gain a 1-1 tie with UC II in Group III play. Bill Swybroos scored for the junior Redmen while Joe White registered for PHE.

As a result of the departure of Trinity B, Group III stands as follows:

Group III	P	W	L	T	Pts.
Jr. SPS	4	2	1	1	5
PHE II	4	2	1	1	5
UC II	3	1	1	1	3
Pharmacy A	3	0	2	1	1

BASKETBALL

A lone basketball encounter saw Law A edge Winless Dents A, 49-47. It was the first win for the lawyers in Group II action.

Dave Grant was high man for Law with 16 points while Gord Chong and Bob Jones both hooped 15 points in a losing cause.

Grudge game causes flare at SAC meeting

What started out as a friendly rivalry between The Varsity and the SAC is rapidly developing into a bitter grudge match.

At Wednesday night's SAC meeting, Finance Commissioner Larry Ward asked his coach, "Toe" Cunningham when the game would be played. To this, Varsity coach, "Punch" Kollins, alert as ever, suggested that, "Maybe the SAC is so scared of the ferocious Varsity Inkmen that their coach is afraid to tell his players when the game will take place."

Before "Toe" could reply to this slur, his supreme boss, SAC President Doug Ward, leaped to his feet and in a burst of impassioned oratory, screamed, "The Varsity may talk a good game, we will play a good one."

Ward's declamations were greeted with screams of applause from his frenzied followers on council.

All this leads the Varsity strategists to believe that SAC is finally beginning to take this game seriously and that the Inkmen can expect some vigorous retaliation in the next few weeks, perhaps in the form of muggings and threats upon the lives of Varsity players.

Ward's remark about the Fluffies playing a good game has also led to speculation that SAC has been practicing on the sly. This would be, to say the least, most unethical, since the Inkmen have yet to don the blades as a unit.

IN THE NET: Varsity coach and general manager, "Punch" Kollins announced the signing of all-star wingman Paul (Le Powerful Pierre) Henderson, a young player who left Detroit Red Wings to come and write basketball for The Varsity and play hockey for the Inkmen.

Both Henderson and Kollins say that they are pleased with the terms of the contract, which is reported to be in the neighbourhood of $10,000 with various fringe benefits.

However, "Punch" was less successful in his efforts to sign two early holdouts, Al "Shutout" Schoenborn and Steve "Body-Basher" Barker. After the latest contract meeting held Thursday afternoon, Barker snapped "Ridiculous" when asked about Punch's latest offer and Schoenborn's remark was unprintable.

SAC has yet to announce any signings.

FOR DUAL MEET

Undefeated fencers at Kingston

Varsity's undefeated fencing team travels to Kingston Saturday to slap swords with teams from Royal Military College and McGill.

Blues defeated RMC earlier this year but the meeting with McGill will be the first of the season. McGill finished second in last year's Intercollegiate championships behind University of Montreal. Varsity placed third.

In Blues last outing, Helmut Microys won six out of six events against Rochester Institute of Technology and Nansung Ho won four out of six. All their wins came in the foil and epee.

Puckmen meet Gaels in home opener tonight

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues play host to Queen's Golden Gaels in the regular season home opener tonight at Varsity Arena. Starting time has been moved up to 7 p.m. from the usual 8 p.m. opening for this game.

Gaels have been strengthened by the addition of some new talent since Blues blanked them, 6-0, in Kingston back in December. The biggest addition is right winger Larry Jones of Guelph, a top scorer with McGill Redmen the past three seasons.

Two seasons ago, Jones was fifth highest scorer in the old Eastern Division and last season was eighth with nine goals and nine assists.

He is now studying law at Queen's.

Two names, familiar to football fans, have also been added to Gaels' roster, Bayne Norrie of North Bay and Jim Mare of Toronto. This pair should add some beef to Queens' weak attack.

Another player of note in Gaels' lineup is centre Bill Colvin, who formerly played junior "A" hockey with St. Michael's Majors. Also in the lineup is Dave Lough, who played in Varsity's interfaculty league and is now studying Medicine at Queen's.

Gaels have one distinction; their goaltender, Elwin Derbyshire, is the tallest in the intercollegiate league at 6-foot, 4-inches.

While this is only the third league game of the season for Blues, the team is in excellent shape. Blues have played 12 games, including exhibitions, compiling an 8-3-1 record. The 12 games played are only three short of Blues' total number of contests last season.

Coach Joe Kane feels the layoff since the Boston Christmas tournament has given his players a much-needed and well-deserved rest after the demanding early-season grind.

Kane added that Blues should be ready for the race to the Queen's Cup that begins in earnest tonight.

Blues will have two newcomers in the lineup tonight but will be without veteran Stu McNeil. The rookies are Gary Aitken, who has won the regular goaltending job since his impressive play at Boston, and Doug Jones, a University College freshman forward.

McNeil, an all-star last season, has been playing off and on for Blues this season because of his demanding Medicine course and will probably retire for the remainder of the campaign.

Stray Shorts: Doug Jones will replace Chris Speyer in the lineup.... Rookie forward Butch McGee is recovered from an early-season leg injury but will not play tonight.... McMaster and McGill tangle in Montreal tonight and Waterloo is at Quebec City to play Laval... Mac goes to Queen's and Waterloo to Montreal tomorrow night.

LARRY JONES

Cagers play top-rated Florida after trouncing Hawks, 109-64

By PAUL HENDERSON

Varsity Basketball Blues face their toughest opposition of the season tomorrow night when Florida Southern College Moccasins invade Hart House for an 8:30 p.m. Athletic Night contest.

In preparation for the game, Blues exceeded the 100 mark for the first time this year in trouncing Waterloo Lutheran University, 109-64, here Wednesday.

The powerful Florida Southern squad boasts an 8-1 record, their only defeat coming Wednesday in a close 83-75 match with Colgate.

Recent winners of the Sixth Annual Citrus Invitational Tournament, Moccasins are led by co-captains Dave Shinkman and Tim Eisnagle. Eisnagle, a 6'3" senior, is the team's top scorer and Most Valuable Player. He is averaging 22.8 points of the Squad's average of 90 points per game.

Tallest member of Moccasins is 6'6" Tom Dawson, a strong rebounder who has been hitting on 57.4 per cent of his field goal attempts.

Every Florida Southern player is over six feet in height and will present a real test of basketball for Blues.

Blues were not put to the test, however, when they registered the triumph over Waterloo Lutheran.

Ed Bordas paced the Varsity attack in the loosely played game. He netted 28 points on 10 field goals and eight free throws, and climaxed the evening with a spectacular two-handed dunk shot to chalk up the 100th point. Along with Dave Ouchterlony, Bordas also rebounded well.

Blues employed a full-court press at the beginning of the game but failed to harass Hawks. Blues rushed and were hampered by mediocre shooting.

As a result, Hawks trailed by only 51-40 at the half.

The second half was a different story. Blues controlled the ball to outscore the opposition, 29-7, in the third quarter.

Captain John O'Neill and guard Bill Woloshyn both found the mark and hooped 20 and 19 points respectively. Although he experienced an off-night, Dave West still scored a creditable 18 points.

Bob Turner was top man for Waterloo Lutheran with 12 points. Earl Linzon, Gary Cuff, John Lewis and Don Collins each added nine points.

Under the Basket: Varsity coach John McManus should be relieved that his team showed more depth in this game, shooting 41 per cent. Previously, West and Bordas had been carrying most of the load. . . . Hawks shot only 22 per cent in the second half.

Blues — Bordas (28), O'Neill (20), Woloshyn (19), West (18), Baranowicz (18), Neidre (8), Ouchterlony (6), Kime (2), Andrew and McKenzie.
Hawks — Turner (12), Carr (9), Collins (9), Lewis (9), Linzon (9), Woodburn (7), Ocheine (6), Gorman (2), Dart (1), Chris, Eaton and Heinbecker.

SENTIMENT DOESN'T WIN ANY HOCKEY GAMES

Joe Kane doesn't pull any punches. That's why Varsity Hockey Blues will probably win the Queen's Cup this season.

Kane, who is a full-time lawyer and a part-time hockey coach, has little use for sentiment when it comes to forming a hockey team. There is only one criterion for players on his team—they must be the best available.

This fact has been in evidence since Kane took over Blues' reins last season from Jack Kennedy. But Kane's produce-or-else attitude has come into full bloom this season, and especially in the last few weeks.

Things get so complicated at times that if you don't follow the team from one day to the next you might not recognize Blues the next time you see the mplay. The star of yesterday might be the has-been of today.

Before Christmas, few, if any, Varsity fans had ever heard of Gary Aitken. Now Aitken is Varsity's number one goaltender and former netminder Larry Soden is out of a job.

Kane added Aitken to his squad just before the holidays after the 18-year-old blond, crew-cut sophomore had led University College Redmen to four wins in a row in the inter-faculty league. Aitken played his first game as a Blue at the Boston invitational tournament and was a standout as Blues defeated Northeastern, 6-1. Varsity was outshot, 40-33, in the game. In Aitken's second game Blues trounced Boston College, 9-1.

Aitken's heroics gained him the goaltending berth on the all-tournament team, chosen from the seven teams at the tournament.

Now Aitken is Kane's number one man between the pipes and will be in the nets when Blues play host to Queen's Golden Gaels tonight at the Bloor Street Ice Palace.

Kane didn't waste any time in declaring Aitken his goaltender.

"He's the best we've got," said fiery Joe.

It's as simple as that.

MCNEIL MAY HAVE PLAYED HIS LAST GAME

Aitken won't be the only new face in Blues' lineup tonight. Kane has also picked up forward Doug Jones, a freshman who was Aitken's teammate with UC Redmen. And with the addition of Jones, someone has to sit the game out. Chris Speyer, although in his second year with Blues, gets the nod from Kane to wear the civvies.

It's a simple philosophy. The players the coach feels are the best play the games.

Kane has shown he's the boss in other ways, these less well-known. Last year, for example, when Kane felt one of his veterans wasn't putting out, he booted him off the team. The player soon rejoined the squad but it is more than coincidence that he's been playing better ever since.

And early this season, Kane used the same treatment on a highly-rated rookie. The coach felt this individual was reading his press clippings too closely and needed to be put back in his place. A short "suspension" was the remedy.

Some may question Kane's hard-nosed attitude but, after all, his purpose is to win games, and if he does you can't knock success.

Last season Kane believed he had the championship team. He was wrong. This season he's even more sure of himself, but now he has all the goods to back him up.

"Our drawback last season was our weak defence," Kane commented, "But now I think we have the best defence in the league. In fact, outside of McKendry (rookie Jim McKendry of McMaster) I think we have the best four defencemen in the league."

One lineup switch that might hurt Blues is the apparent loss to the team of veteran Stu McNeil, a former pro with Detroit Red Wings. This roster change, however, is not Kane's doing, it's McNeil's.

McNeil, an all-star last season, is in his final medical year and is married with two children. Needless to say, he has little spare time on his hands. Stu has been with Blues off and on this season but it is unlikely he will have much, if any, time to play hockey the rest of the season.

"Stuey is still welcome to play," said Kane, "but he likely won't have the time."

Don't think for a minute that Blues' lineup is finally set. Forward Butch McGee is eager to crack the starting team after recovering from a leg injury and just yesterday another eligibility form was submitted to the athletic office at Hart House. It was signed by Bill Bowen, I Arts, Victoria College.

Kane may have provided the key to his thought when he said, "I have to keep them all on their toes. I can't let these guys get overconfident, you know."

DEFENDING CHAMPIONS HERE

Ray German grapples with former Aggie teammates

A highlight of Saturday's Athletic Night will be the wrestling match between Varsity and the Intercollegiate champion Ontario Agricultural College team in Hart House at 8 p.m.

This match is the first regularly scheduled home meet for Varsity's wrestlers, who hope to avenge the subterfuge used by OAC in winning the OQAA title last year.

Varsity defeated OAC a week before the championship tilt last year and seemed destined for the title but Aggies spent the next week in the steam room losing weight.

The result was that Aggie wrestlers fought in lower weight divisions the day of the championship and Varsity's grapplers found themselves wrestling unaccustomed opponents.

One of the Aggies who won that day was footballer Ray German, now wearing Blues' togs. He is a possible starter against heavyweight Moe Sauve Saturday.

A rookie find for Varsity team is Alvin McKenzie, a 137-pound wrestler who won the Ontario high school title the past two years. Wrestling in Buffalo before Christmas, McKenzie fought to a draw with Bill Riddle, a member of the U.S. Pan American Games wrestling team.

Other U of T rookie to fight Saturday are Wayne Carney (123 lb.) and Phil Headley (191 lb.). Returning matmen are Clive Good (130 lb.) John Holt (147 lb.) Larry Angus (157 lb.) Bob Griffiths (167 lb.) and Don Merker (177 lb.)

Model Parliament committee promises no more news leaks

By JIM MacKENZIE
Varsity News Editor

A Model Parliament committee meeting Friday decided that details of preparations and resolutions for Model Parliament should be kept in trust by the four parties.

The decision followed a criticism of the Liberals' first two resolutions by New Democratic opposition leader Mary Brewin (II Trin), published in a front-page story in Friday's Varsity.

Miss Brewin had accused the government of vagueness in its resolutions. She has subsequently been criticized by both Liberal house leader Mike Levine (II UC) and Model Parliament chairman Ian Thompson.

Levine said last night that pre-parliament debate could ruin the parliament itself, giving participants pre-conceived opinions of the government's policy. He termed Miss Brewin's open criticism "a reflection on the inexperience of her caucus in the model parliamentary system."

Thompson said last night he could not stop the parties from arguing before parliament opened, adding that party representatives at Friday's meeting agreed not to hand out the written resolutions to non-caucus persons.

Thompson refused to give The Varsity copies of the resolutions Friday. "I don't think The Varsity has a right to see the resolutions beforehand, and I don't think Mary Brewin should have spoken as she did to The Varsity. This attitude will have Model Parliament over before it begins," Thompson said.

Four more resolutions are scheduled to be finished by tomorrow.

Thompson said Friday he did not intend to give The Varsity copies of these resolutions either. "I don't think The Varsity should know details of the resolutions until they get a copy when Model Parliament sits," he said.

The Varsity had seen the first two resolutions Thursday, when they were criticised by the NDP, but had no copies of its own. Only five copies were printed, one for the committee and each of the parties.

Levine did not share Thompson's attitude of reticence. Friday, Liberal whip Tony Careless (II Trin) said he would not let any detailed information out before parliament began. "We decided it is up to the parties to keep details like contents of the speech from the throne secret," Thompson said after Friday's meeting.

Levine, however, had told The Varsity some contents of the throne speech, which he wrote, when asked to clarify some of the vagueness of the resolutions.

He indicated that a "Canada act" to be drawn up at a proposed federal-provincial conference would call for the formation of a capital district similar to Washington, D.C. Training colleges for bilingual civil servants, scholarships for bilingual students and civil service pay incentives were all cited by Levine as government programs to be sought for the capital area that would embrace Ottawa and Hull.

Levine also said the throne speech would call for increased old-age pensions and health benefits, and a broad reciprocity treaty similar to a recent American bill. The bill gave the Kennedy administration wide bargaining powers with trading nations which had made concessions themselves.

Levine justified his giving information as a reaction to the NDP attack. "It was generally understood that the resolutions were not to be attacked until after the speech from the throne. Miss Brewin has neglected a trust by her criticism," he said.

He felt The Varsity was not given copies of the resolutions since it was not the terms of expression but the basic ideas of the resolutions that mattered.

Levine was countered by Thompson, who accused the Liberals of having to talk to The Varsity and back to Miss Brewin in an effort "to save face."

"Their resolutions were rather colorless, more of a question mark than anything," said Thompson last night.

He felt other parties would try to become more concrete in their amendments, and try to defeat the government on the basis of this strength of expression.

He called Levine's explanations to The Varsity "very interesting."

Miss Brewin defended her original criticism of the Liberals, by saying she felt pre-parliament discussion and criticism aroused interest in the parliament itself. She attributed the secrecy before previous parliaments as the cause of "stereotyped" past sessions.

Miss Brewin added, however, that she was "not sure" on how much should be said since the Friday meeting's ruling called for secrecy and non-particular remarks.

SAC hearings open today

The first session of the University Committee hearings on the role of student government will be held in the conference room of the Students' Administrative Council building tonight from 7 to 9 p.m.

The hearings are open to the public.

John Roberts (II Wyc), chairman of the committee, commented last night on the opening of the hearings.

"We have been encouraged by the attitude of one or two members of the administration who have offered to make submissions, he said.

"However, I regret that the spirit of the hearings has been misinterpreted by some people. We are not primarily hostile to any group or individual.

"Our purpose is to draw on the experience and knowledge of all sections of the campus community in order to formulate a sound, constructive SAC policy for the future.

Sessions will also be held Wednesday and Friday afternoons, and further sessions will be scheduled if necessary to accommodate all of those who have indicated their willingness to make submissions.

Magistrate offers out on booze rap

Winnipeg (Special) — University student Curtis Butterfield, 20, of Winnipeg, said he could not pay the $25 fine when he appeared before his neighbor Magistrate Isaac Rice, for drinking while a minor.

The magistrate offered to pay it—on condition Butterfield shovel Magistrate Rice's driveway for the rest of the winter. The student paid the fine after leaving court, but said he'd shovel the driveway anyway.

SMC prof says man 'absurd'

How to raise religious questions in the contemporary complex of a progressively Westernized world was the theme of Professor E. J. Schonleber's debate with graduate student Ravi Gupta Friday in the Graduate Union.

In the backwash of 19th century nihilism, traditional religion has suffered, Prof. Schonleber said.

"Now that man knows he is no longer the centre of the universe, he realizes the futility and absurdity of the human condition."

Professor Schonleber said the problem had almost been reduced to a state of asking about asking.

Moreover, he argued, if history is both accumulative and progressive, the religious question can never be asked twice.

Gupta replied by saying that in the East it has always been the outsider who has historically asked the religious question.

The most important religious question, he continued, was that of "Who am I?" a question beyond history and the social condition of man, having been asked in all ages.

Whether God exists or not is a hopeless question, he decided, because attempts through the ages have failed to prove or disprove the question.

The debate was the first in a series of discussions on Aspects of Religion. Weekly papers by campus professors will continue until mid-March, observing theories of the major world religions.

Eng. prexy wins award

Don Monro (IV APSC) was awarded the Engineering Second Mile Award last week. Presented annually by the class of 3T5, the award recognizes leadership by a graduating engineering student on the Engineering Society executive.

The award has a cash value of $200.

Monro is president of the society this year and was leader of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band for two years previous. He was also class president last year.

CUP COMMENT

By BRUCE KIDD

Ottawa, the seat of the federal capital, does not officially recognize the French language. And Mayor Charlotte Whitton refuses to do anything about it.

Attention was focused on this sorry situation shortly before Christmas when about 200 University of Ottawa students ignored a police order forbidding any demonstration and staged a March for Ottawa on city hall. On the eve of what had been a well-planned protest, U of O student council withdrew its support for the march.

The students were indignant over Mayor Whitton's recent about-face on the bilingual status of Ottawa. When no French-Canadian was elected to board of control at last year's municipal elections, her worship staunchly promised to defend Ottawa's French-speaking citizenry. But when an appeal was made requesting bilingual status for Ottawa, Miss Whitton declared the city has absolutely no authority to institute such a change. That authority rests with Queen's Park, she asserted.

Yet Wilfred Spooner, Ontario minister of municipal affairs, has answered that no obstacle to such a change exists in provincial legislation, and if Ottawa were to press for bilingualism, she would get it. Sweet Charlotte is simply passing the buck.

In one aspect, the March for Ottawa was quite similar to U of T's March for Canada. In the eyes of an aldermanic observer, the March "was one of the most orderly demonstrations I have ever seen. The students walked two by two along the sidewalk, and were careful to observe all laws regarding stop lights."

Council withdrew its support for the protest when the chief of police refused students a demonstration permit. But it has started legal action to ensure in future students will have the right to protest. A writ of mandamus has been issued to the chief of police to discover why students were not granted permission to demonstrate.

MORE BOOKSTORE PUBLIC RELATIONS

What would you do if a text book you had purchased from the University Bookstore contained a note saying the store had been given the book free? It happened to a McMaster student last week.

The bookstore refunded the student's money.

OH YE OF LITTLE FAITH DEPARTMENT

What news item was the most inadequately reported of 1963? The circumstances behind the Sept. 4 abdication of Homer Tomlinson as The King of All the Nations of Men must surely receive this award.

The reason this remarkably significant event was so overlooked was that only The Church of God, a newspaper which Tomlinson publishes himself and which The Varsity receives only infrequently, had the news sense to mention it.

While few of us recollect too vividly that solemn ceremony nine years ago when Tomlinson proclaimed himself King of All the Nations of Men, many of us can remember the autumn Friday of 1961 when Homer humbly accepted the title as King of the University of Toronto. And during his short reign, Homer was anointed King "of every nation, of every great city, of every state, of (other) great universities, of chemistry, of industry, and of agriculture."

As Homer understood it, his duty was to change the world. September 4 marked his "Day of Victory" for on that date the transformation was complete. Then could the King proudly boast that earth had been changed "from a world of nervewracking fears of wars and rampant poverty, to a time, the first time, the whole world has breathed easy since the days of King Solomon."

Mission accomplished, Homer Tomlinson "abdicated as King of All the Nations of Men in the conviction that the goals were completed, and peace and prosperity had come in newness of meaning to all the world."

So great proved Homer's Victory, that in the most recent issue of The Church of God, he proclaimed a triumphal "Celebration"; "Plagues, Earthquakes, and Wars have given way to Health, Quiet Resting Places, and World Wide Peace." We have his promise that no more will mortals be troubled by such calamities.

Nostalgia be damned. We are living in the Golden Age.

SWEDISH BEAUTY CAUSE OF POPPY DAY STINK

Not without its Remembrance Day controversy was Cambridge University, England.

There the crowing of a 17-year-old Swedish blonde as Miss Poppy Day caused several disgruntled losers to complain about the suitability of allowing girls from non-allied countries to compete for the title. Belly-ached one runner-up: "After all, the Swedes didn't exactly rally to our aid in the war."

But editorialized the Cambridge Varsity: "This is a regrettable reflection on the spirit of Poppy Day. If the successful young lady had come from a country which had been genuinely an enemy 20 years ago, this would have been an occasion for rejoicing rather than insular grumbling."

Hear, hear.

Canadian performers top ice show

Canadian champions will top the list of individual performers in the Winter Carnival Ice show. Paulette Doan and Ken Ormsby, who placed third in the 1963 World Championships, will demonstrate Ice Dancing, the most graceful of all ice events.

Valerie Jones, 1962 Canadian Junior Champ, who took fourth place in the recent Olympic trials will perform a free skating exhibition.

Other individual stars will be Philip McCordic, Doreen Lister, and Bradley Black, all former Canadian Junior Champs, along with Gregory Clark, one of the stars of last year's show, Larry Webster, Ruth FitzGibbon, Lewis Lumley, and Paul Rapai, University of Detroit skating star.

This year's numbers will mainly emphasize comedy and colour in precision group numbers.

There will be a special race between two speed skaters, a sofar unidentified figure skater and Varsity Hockey player Bruce Kidd. In a similar race, former world champion Carol Heiss skating backward, lapped a certain New York Ranger (who prefers anonymity due to his embarrassment) twice in a ten lap race. Which pair of legs will make it.

New this year will be a barrel jumping event.

Tickets go on sale Tuesday 8:30 a.m. in the SAC office.

Paulette Doan and Ken Ormsby, North American Dance Champions are featured at this year's Winter Carnival Ice Show.

NEWS IN BRIEF

We goofed again

The Varsity is as anxious as anyone else to hurry the winter along, but we must apologize for over anxiety expressed (incorrectly) last week.

The Hart House members' exhibition of photography will NOT be held this month as stated in Friday's Varsity. The exhibition will run from Feb. 17 to 29. Final entry date is Feb. 14.

And tickets for the Winter Carnival '64 entertainment and dance events go on sale tomorrow at 8:30 a.m., in the SAC building.

A French Kildare

Scene: Chambers of Hart House Theatre.

Page: Oyez, oyez! All rise! Le Malade Imaginaire will on the 17th of January anno domini 1964 be presented in these chambers. The French Club of the University...

First Citizen: Moliere? Isn't he that brilliant dancer from Russia?

Second Citizen (patronizingly): Moliere, my dear fellow, as every francophile knows, is the most brilliant comedian ever to set pen to paper. You must be acquainted with the highly satirical story of Le Malade Imaginaire — the man whose doctors falsely convince him that he was ill; whose wife convinced him that she loved him and not his money; his two innocent daughters whom his wife wanted to stick in a convent to keep them away from the money; whose eyes were finally opened by a maid-servant's cunning ruse.

Page: Will you shut up already! You're stealing all my lines! ... The French Club of the university of Toronto will present this daring play. It is the history of a man, his treacherous wife, his two charming daughters and his villainous doctors.

First Citizen: Are you some kind of advertising nut or something?

Carnival tickets

When tickets go on sale Tuesday at 8:30 a.m. in the SAC office for Winter Carnival '64, a new ticket sale policy will be under way for Varsity Arena.

The arena will be divided into two equal sections for the Ice Show and the Brothers Four Concert. One-half will be limited to four tickets per person.

The other half will be sold in blocks to interested groups. This policy will continue for three days, after which any remaining tickets will be sold on a first come basis.

Tickets for the Ice Show, Jan. 31 are 75 cents per person: for the Semi-Formal Dance Feb. 1, they are $2.50 per couple; and for the Brothers Four Concert, they are $1.25 per person.

Editor suspended

HALIFAX (Special) — Gerry Levitz, editor of the Dalhousie University weekly newspaper the Gazette, has been placed on three weeks' probation by the university student council.

He was charged with not writing enough critical editorials.

Levitz had recently returned from the Canadian University Press conference in Vancouver where the Gazette failed for the first time in four years to place in the competitions among Canadian university newspapers.

Council President George Cooper said the council did not intend to fire Levitz, but wanted to impress upon him their desire for critical editorials.

The Gazette editor is paid a yearly honorarium of $250.

Drama group undecided

The University of Toronto Drama Committee has not decided which of the six plays presented Friday will represent U of T in the Canadian Inter-Varsity Festival in Ottawa next month.

The annual Festival of One-Act Plays, an unofficial competition for original student productions, was adjudicated by actor Eric Christmas. Excellent attendance on both nights doubled the figures of the previous year.

Committee chairman Mary Welsman (III UC) said last night: "The general level of production was up considerably from previous years."

The eventual choice of the committee will be based on the adjudicatory remarks of Last October The Varsity criticized the Model Parliament organization because the then existing structure encouraged political opportunism and discouraged any worthwhile contribution to the campus political scene.

The Model Parliament committee of the Students' Administrative Council subsequently changed the ground rules, with the support of a majority of the campus political parties.

The changes were designed to eliminate the trivialities which are usually associated with model parliaments and elections, and place the debates on an intelligent and constructive level.

But during the past four days we have seen that these trivialities remain and may even have increased.

Thursday The Varsity obtained copies of Liberal party resolutions on its Economic and Confederation stands. These were criticized by the New Democratic Party members. And then The Varsity was criticized by the chairman of the Model Parliament committee for printing the resolutions and the NDP criticism.

But the Liberal party did not object to the publication of the resolutions, and party leader Mike Levine went further and told a reporter the contents of the throne speech, which will be given when the parliament meets. Thompson resigned himself to seeing the issues debated before the parties meet for the formal session.

Thompson's criticism of The Varsity in this matter is unjustified — if not ridiculous. The model parliamentarians have constantly asked that they be taken seriously.

The role of a newspaper in a political situation is to print all the news whenever it learns of that news. The Varsity treated the Liberal resolution and NDP reaction as legitimate news and printed it immediately. In effect Thompson criticized the paper for taking the campus politicians seriously — something he has been pleading for all year.

If The Varsity erred, it was in taking the political parties seriously and wasting valuable space. The resolutions released by the Liberals were vague and of no consequence. The reactions of the NDP, while accurate, only served to compound the absurdity. And chairman Thompson's reactions elevated the situation to a farce of the first order.

american students

This week's outbreak of rioting in Panama once again reveals that the United States is sitting on a powder keg in Latin America. Considering its insistence on Egyptian rights over the Suez Canal in 1956, Washington has no moral leg to stand on in the present situation.

Panama began its career in 1903 as a canal in search of a country when the U.S. sponsored a local revolution to further its canal building ambitions by detaching Panama from the Colombian Republic. Sixty years later Panamanian nationalism is being turned against its U.S. creator.

Perhaps the most ironic twist of all is that the present explosion was produced by American student intolerance. A long tradition of polite imperialism should have taught American intellectuals that if you hold the real power anyway it is wise to be graceful about mere symbols such as a people's flag.

3

By KEN DRUSHKA

The open hostilities between some Students' Administrative Council members and the administration which developed last year died when the brief requesting constitutional changes for the SAC went to the board of governor's special committee on the SAC.

This event took place at about the same time the SAC ceased its activities for the year; and the expectation that the brief would be dealt with by the special committee salvaged the feelings of council members.

An additional pacifying factor was the appointment of Dr. Moffat St. Andrew Woodside as academic vice-president of the university. When he assumed this position Dr. Woodside was also given the job of acting as liaison between the SAC and the administration.

QUIET NEGOTIATIONS

Negotiations this year have been peaceful and council president Doug Ward has expressed satisfaction with the relations with Dr. Woodside. Although the committee has not yet reported, it is felt that its delay has been caused by the depth to which the requested changes have been investigated and the implications of the changes to the board of governors.

But while relations this year may be more peaceful, Ward is no less convinced than his predecessors of the need for autonomy.

He views the collection of fees by the board as a sort of tax rental agreement, and believes that the board cannot be considered as giving the money to the SAC.

He holds that the SAC—ultimately the SAC President—should be responsible for student funds, and the hiring of its own staff. However, he does think the board should have some control in releasing the business manager in order to provide stability for the position.

MUST BE RESPONSIBLE

While there is a feeling among some administrators that future councils can not be counted upon to act in a fully responsible manner, Ward says the SAC "must be free to make our own mistakes as well as successes; and we must be responsible for those mistakes."

He points out that the board would still be able to hold back on the SAC's money in cases of gross irresponsibility. The increased responsibility would tend to make students more responsible, Ward says.

STUDENT CENTRE

Another issue between the SAC and the administration is the proposed student centre—to be paid for from student funds. Last year the SAC submitted a 40-page brief to the board of governors which outlined the office needs of the various campus organizations, and the needs of students in general.

The board's answer was to offer room in Bancroft Hall on Huron St. and pass the brief on to the president's advisory committee on accommodations and facilities.

Nothing on the centre has been heard from that committee and as far as is known, the centre is not even on the lists for planned expansion.

ACADEMIC CONCERN

Many students are concerned with more facilities. Ward is one who would like the initials "SAC" also to mean Students' Academic Council, and he would like to see students having a voice in academic matters.

He believes Dr. Bissell is not opposed to this idea, particularly since the academic vice-president, now is dealing with students.

Ward believes the SAC, as the only representative student body, should be acting on decisions made by academic departments. As it is now, individual students can petition the Senate on academic matters, but it is obvious that an individual voice can have little weight in a university the size of the University of Toronto.

FORMAL VOICE NEEDED

To gain this academic position the SAC would need a formal voice on the Senate or one of the committees. Now, council could represent itself through Dr. Bissell, but it is still deprived of a voice in the decision-making process.

Many other students are also thinking in terms of a student academic voice. The basis of their thinking is that as recipients of knowledge, students should have some say in what is taught and how it is taught. They realize they are not in a position to make all the decisions, but feel they should at least have a say and a chance to air grievances.

CAMPUS CO-OP

The Campus Co-op is one of the few organizations which is considering an academic position for students; and its business manager Howard Adelman is particularly concerned with the question.

Part of Adelman's argument refers to the origin of many European universities. In medieval times universities began in two ways: students gathered together, hired teachers and were taught the subjects they wanted to learn; others started when scholars gathered a following of students.

When universities began in North America there were no students and few scholars. Therefore, a third body had to establish the universities—and this body was either the church or the state.

Dr. Samuel P. Capen, the former chancellor of the University of Buffalo, has said that it was the original intent of these third bodies to relinquish their control to the academic members of the universities once their task of establishment was over.

"But when that task was completed they showed about the same amount of enthusiasm for withering that Stalin and his associates now (1953) exhibit," Dr. Capen said.

ACADEMIC CONTROL

Adelman says that the Co-op idea of a student-run college is merely one of placing the policy control of the university in the hands of the academics and of having the administration take its direction from these persons.

With luck and the right kind of people, the Co-op itself may develop into such an institution. If it is successful in its bid to obtain a charter as Rochdale college—and this appears to be almost certain—it is possible that in the future Rochdale college could be a teaching college with all policy decisions made by teachers and students, and an administration hired by these two groups to carry out policy decisions.

QUEBEC IDEAS

Another encouraging factor for U of T students is the student "revolt" now taking place in Quebec. The Quebec universities now are run by the Roman Catholic church. Quebec students are demanding the removal of church influence and a voice for themselves.

A popular French-Canadian student concept of university government involves a three-level structure. Three bodies—students, faculty and a government appointed administrative body—would exist on the secondary level. The supreme governing body would consist of a meeting of the three bodies. All academic decisions would be made by a meeting of the faculty and students.

The difference between this concept and that which prevails at U of T is, first, the government would not have a direct line to the supreme governing body, as it does here through the board of governors.

Second, faculty, students and administration would have a say in all administrative decision-making. And third, students would have a voice in all academic decisions.

These and other ideas are beginning to intrigue more students at U of T and elsewhere all the time. What the final outcome of these ambitions will be is an unknown factor, but it is certain that they will have an effect on the new form the universities must inevitably adapt.

Letters on the Literary Issue

WANTS MORE

Although I did not contribute any selections to your Literary Issue I would like to make the following suggestions.

Would it be possible to have a "poetry corner" or "literary corner" in every Friday issue of The Varsity? I myself feel that this would provide interest and variety, and would be a good source of student thought and creativity.

I don't think there would be any trouble in recruiting new writers or poetry, and several short poems published weekly would surely add "class" to The Varsity.

Paul Chumerk,
II SMC.

A FAILURE

The Varsity's presentation of a Literary Issue implies that something resembling Literature (as opposed to didactic or informative material) is about to be graciously bestowed upon us poor, sensation-starved scholars seeking sensual satisfaction.

However, there is little aesthetical pleasure derived from reading lousy poetry. And last Friday's Varsity fairly reeked with it.

After all, the intrinsic purpose of literature is to capture in words, in beautiful, unusual ways, some aspect of life — whether that aspect is sordid or sublime — and thus evoke a positive response from the reader. The idea itself is not really important; but the method of expressing it is. Therefore, the good poet does not find it necessary to resort to vulgarity when dealing with vulgarity.

This is not being negative or unrealistic. Dignity in poetry imparts to man the concept of his own dignity and the inherent value of his body and intelligence. The fact that the "Literary Issue" fails to credit us for having any renders its a complete failure.

Emily Mandy,
I SMC.

BLOODY GOOD

This is to let you know that I very much enjoyed your Literary Issue, although it seemed slightly overridled with sex. Mist and Arabian Magi are poems that caught my fancy — none of the stories had enough real interest to encourage one to go beyond three columns or so.

All in all, though, I hope this idea is a thing that will be repeated — bloody good, I say.

STRIFE TORN PANAMA HALF-CENTURY OLD U. S. CREATION

By GORD LAXER

Recent disturbances in Panama are only the latest, though perhaps the most grave episode, in the dealings of that country with the United States.

The Republic of Panama was born of American design 60 years ago. Much of the present trouble there dates back to its inception.

The United States acquired new island possessions in the Caribbean and the Pacific in 1898, and the construction of an inter-oceanic canal became vital to American interests. By the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 between Britain and the U.S. the Americans were permitted to build and administer a canal to link the two oceans.

The treaty provided that the canal would be open to all nations on equal terms.

There was an earlier attempt to build the canal through Panama by a French firm headed by De Lesseps, engineer of the Suez Canal. By 1889 the effort had failed.

The Spooner-Act of 1902 authorized the U.S. President to acquire the French concession for $40,000,000 if the Colombian republic would cede a strip of land across the Isthmus of Panama.

The U.S. government proceeded to offer Colombia a lump sum of $10,000,000 and $250,000 a year annual rent for a 100-year lease of a 10-mile-wide canal zone.

The Colombian government hemmed and hawed, even after Secretary of State Hay's dire warnings that something dreadful would happen in case of rejection.

As a result of Colombia's recalcitrance, an informal meeting of Panamanian businessmen, agents of the Panama Company and U.S. army officers, was held in July of 1903

'TOO LIMITED AND TOO RISKY'

Sex is better in college but sometimes it's difficult

By BOB SOROKOLIT

Undergraduates at the Trinity College men's residence are still awaiting a decision on their petition for increased visiting hours for women in their rooms on weekends.

Harvard's Dean John Munro had labelled a similar request from his students last month as "a licence to use college rooms for wild parties or for sexual intercourse."

But Trinity's Dean of Men A. J. Earp said he would have had no anxiety about his decision, if the Toronto newspapers had not publicized "a private internal matter of the college."

"I am satisfied with the behavior of my students. They set and observe their own codes," he said.

But Mr. Earp admitted that "promiscuity exists whether it is in residence or not, and thus it is not affected by extended hours."

Women now are allowed in Trinity's rooms on Friday from 8—12 p.m. and on Sunday from 3—11 p.m. Residents want added hours on Saturday from 3 p.m. to midnight, mainly for a place to go following weekend activities like football games.

Actually, the request is not a major issue in the residence, and a number of residents questioned don't really care.

"Women have never been permitted to visit the men's bedrooms in St. Michael's College residences," said Rev. G. D. O'Gorman.

"Oh yes, the odd student asks about this, but he knows there is no hope of breaking the rule," he said. But women can visit their friends in the College common room before 10:30 p.m.

Last year, some Victoria College students had reacted indignantly to new rules limiting visits to weekends only, instead of a liberal policy throughout the week.

"It was not advantageous from the point of studies," said the senior tutor, Rev. Ernest G. Clarke.

"Students realize the visits are a privilege rather than a right, and are very careful not to lose that privilege." Visiting hours at Victoria's Burwash Hall are from noon to midnight on Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

"The practices of any university residence usually appear too liberal and radical to the outside world," commented Dr. Clarke.

University College Dean of Men H. I. Macdonald said: "We must take the view that this is a private matter about visitors in rooms. People will do what they want to do."

He said that present rules have been the same for the 10-year period of the residences, and nobody wants a change either way. Present regulations allow Wilson residence from supper to midnight and from 3—9 p.m. on Sunday.

Men and women in love have to face regarding visiting privileges in student residences.

One resident admitted: "Love in residence, but it is too limited and take the girl to a hotel. Anyway, no opportunity to meet the right girl for."

to plan a way out. This, of course, was the secession of Panama from the Republic of Colombia.

Bunau Varilla of the revolutionary junta in Panama advised his followers to proceed in perfect assurance of American assistance. On Oct. 19, three U.S. war vessels were ordered to the probable scene of hostilities. On Nov. 2, their commanders were instructed to occupy the Panama railway if a revolution broke out and prevent Colombia from landing troops within miles of the Isthmus.

The secretary of state cabled the American consul at Panama, Nov. 3, 1903: "Uprising on Isthmus reported, keep department promptly and fully informed."

"The consul replied the same afternoon: 'No uprising yet. Reported will be in the night;' and a few hours later: 'Uprising occurred tonight 6; no bloodshed. Government will be organized tonight.'"

The coup proceeded according to plans, and U.S. warships prevented troops from being landed by the Colombian government to restore authority. A declaration of independence was read by General Huertal Nov. 4, at which time he stated: "President Roosevelt has made good." Two days later the United States recognized the Republic of Panama. Twelve days after that, Secretary of State Hay concluded a treaty by which the canal zone was leased in perpetuity to the U.S.

Republican President Roosevelt later declared in a speech: "I took Panama." Harry Truman last Friday agreed with T. Roosevelt's analysis of history, when he stated: "There would not be any Panama if it wasn't for the U.S. We made Panama and we're getting the same there as we got in Cuba. We made Cuba too." Truman attributed all the present trouble to Panamanian ingratitude.

As a result of Panama's secession, all Latin America trembled at the Yanquis' naked show of force. But since Panama's birth, Latin America has become used to American intervention, though has not accepted it.

In a pang of conscience, the United States paid Colombia $25,000,000 in 1921 to quiet her. However she has not succeeded in keeping Panama silent. Since the 1930s, it has been the aim of nationalists to take control of the canal. Almost every year since then, there have been minor clashes over the canal issue.

Panama, in fact, has gained some rights vis-a-vis the canal. The U.S. agreed to increase its annual rent on two different occasions. It now stands at $1,930,000. In addition, in 1963 the United States surrendered its rights to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. Finally in 1961, the Panamanians were granted the right to fly their flag in the canal zone. (Wherever flags are flown in the canal zone, the American and Panamanian flags must be side by side.)

Thus the Americans recognize Panama's titular sovereignty over the canal zone. However the U.S. still controls and administers the zone in reality.

In direct contradiction to American foreign policy on the Panama Canal, has been its policy on Suez. It is important to remember that the United States has never owned or controlled the Suez.

Strangely enough, the American government in the Suez crisis of 1956 was in favor of Egypt's nationalization of the canal. In fact the U.S. government went as far as to threaten oil sanctions against Britain and France should they continue their war operations against Egypt.

This stand taken by the U.S. on the Suez may be explained by her bid to gain back the West's then recently lost ground in the Arab world.

But the striking parallel between the control of the Suez and the Panama canals may not be forgotten by the rest of the world.

The U.S. has given the Republic of Panama less jurisdiction over the Panama Canal than Britain and France gave Egypt over the Suez before the 1956 crisis.

The Panamanians have proposed among other things, to put the canal under an international authority. A similar proposal was made by the French and British at the time of the Suez incident, to which the Americans rejected on the grounds that this would be a breach of Egyptian sovereignty.

The U.S. may be singularly isolated on the Panama issue. Russia has disregarded the East-West detente efforts and has made the most blistering attack on U.S. policy since the test ban treaty.

Neither Britain nor France will be too eager to defend the U.S. considering the American stand on Suez. Canada will not easily be able to defend the U.S. position, because Lester Pearson won the Nobel Peace Prize largely on the basis of his initiative in the Suez crisis.

If the U.S. does not give Panama at least some control over the canal, the American position in Latin America will be seriously weakened.

Dear Parents:

The package of brownies arrived at a perfect moment, just in time to relieve us from the depth of depression. Things are BAD. In fact, they are desperate. Our work has literally ground to a halt. About a month ago the police impounded two of our cars for having out-of-state licence plates. It took a whole month to cut through the red tape necessary to get the cars out of hock. It ran to almost $200, what with storage costs and the costs of transferring titles to Louisiana residents.

Every time we thought we had the cars, a new impediment would arise. When we finally got the cars out, it became evident that the police had so tampered with them that they no longer ran at all. We sold both cars for junk.

We now go everywhere on foot, which means that all of us, ten task force workers, are in Flaquemine, and can do almost nothing except try to raise money from this community, which is so poor that it can barely scrape up enough for a used-tire for a car.

Core could cut down on its activities, but this is impossible considering the situation. We get requests every day for aid from parishes all over the state. Our plans call for our ten workers to go into 21 parishes in the Sixth Congressional District and in North Louisiana. We will lay the ground work for extensive registration drives later, when we have the manpower. We will be working almost exclusively in areas where Negroes outnumber whites, and where, precisely, registration drives are most needed. Some areas haven't changed much since slavery. There is no running water, no indoor toilets, no street lights, no garbage collections, no paved roads. Because of the dust from the roads, children are always under layers of mud. The houses have holes in walls and floor and drainage ditches in front.

What taxes the imagination, however, are the plantations.

Here is where the voter registration promises to bring about a social revolution. But it is here that the work is the hardest, because people have been beaten down for so many years that few are willing to fight back. We've got to travel many miles, spend much time just talking, before we convince one Negro to go to the registrar's office. In a typical week I contact 150 people, train 60, send 18 to the registrar's office, and have 9 of them get registered. It is pathetic that some of the most enthusiastic people are the ones who have common law spouses, which automatically disqualifies them. We are about to head into the last parish in the state where no Negroes are registered.

But we can move nowhere unless we have cars. Ronnie Moore, the field secretary here, tried to buy a new car with money we were able to scrape up from ourselves and the community. He could meet the down payment, but even though he had American Automobile Association credit, no finance company would finance the car, because, they claimed, Ronnie is a poor risk. One said it would finance the car at 7 1/2 per cent but we couldn't afford that, beside we are fed up with giving in to this treatment from white folks. What we need is enough cash to cover the cost of a couple of cars. We cannot continue our work without them. We are desperate. We are ready to sell our blood to a blood bank. Those of us who have rare blood can get a pretty penny for it.

The cold has finally come, and so starts a long hard winter for the folks down here. Most of the homes have highly dangerous gas heaters that give meager warmth. I'm lucky; the house I am staying in has central heating.

One of our workers has just been subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury investigating charges against him of subversive activities, criminal anarchy, public intimidation, extortion, perjury and having whites and Negroes in the same dwelling place. The witch hunt has begun. We're not too worried yet.

Do you remember West Filiciana parish, where no Negroes had been registered? Recently 50 appeared at the Registrar's office, and after much delay and obstruction one Negro was registered. This is real history in the making.

Love,

Mimi

LEFT OF CENTRE MERGER FOR CANADIAN POLITICS?

By WILF DAY

Why was the current talk of merger between the Liberal party and the New Democrats in Ontario inevitable? Behind the twistings of politics lies a desire for a united party of the democratic left — a desire thwarted by a federal politics dominated by two huge parties that do not make sense in classical terms.

What is the democratic left? Various criteria have been used. Their basis is an attitude of mind. When faced with a decision which will affect the interests or reduce the power of the ruling oligarchy and increase the power or opportunity of a new, rising element in society, the conservative will tend to favor the old oligarchy and the radical will tend to favor change. This is not always because of membership in some interest group involved; it is often a temperament inherited from family experience or tradition.

In Canada we have few examples of a classical party system. At the moment, Quebec has the best — a new, urban elite dominated by the growing socially-oriented bureaucracy versus an old, rural elite led by the individually-oriented professions: lawyers, priests, and small-businessmen.

When Diefenbaker first gained power he was to the left of the tired old St. Laurent regime, which had long been the "establishment" in Canada. However, the present positions of the two largest parties are deliberately confused.

The resolution passed by the Canadian Labour Congress in 1958, which opened the door for a realignment in national politics, called for the formation of "a broadly-based people's political movement, embracing . . . the Labour movement and other liberally-minded persons interested in basic social reform and reconstruction through our parliamentary system of government." The only stipulation made was that the new party be democratically financed and controlled:

Many active Liberals and Conservatives agreed with all this; in some parts of Canada, a majority in one or other party might have been willing to take part. The provincial Liberal parties of B. C., Ontario and Quebec were out of power, left of centre, and had little to lose by joining such a move. Similar was the position of the Conservative party of Saskatchewan (whose leader has just announced that he would rather see Woodrow Lloyd premier than Ross Thatcher). However, the federal Liberal party was not notably progressive — and so nothing was done.

The current moves have concentrated on Ontario, a more homogeneous political unit where such conflicts could be avoided. But they are unlikely to produce any public results for some time. The root cause of the formation of the New Democratic party was the unification of the North American labor movement some ten years before.

BARRIERS

The barriers are of two kinds—pragmatic and institutional. Institutional loyalties are strong in both groups, above and beyond any personal economic motives. Many who have no personal stake in trade unions, for example, have made a religion out of helping the underdog; and many have been led to do so by their own religion. Thus the "labor movement", the "movements of social reform" which have formed the core of left-wing parties everywhere, are dedicated to the point of selfrighteousness, and will fight the old battles on a moment's provocation. Yet, these people are often the most genuine and well-meaning champions of social progress.

However, the greatest barriers are pragmatic and are all within the Liberal party. Its federal strength and party funds come mainly from the conservative commercial elites of the large cities. Even the weak provincial party, shorn of most "fair-weather friends", contains many people who would never call themselves "left-wing" and would probably veto any internal reform of the Liberal party. An incredible editorial in the Telegram recently revealed in what contempt democracy is held by such people; they simply cannot understand how a democratic party could exist.

If, as seems possible, the newer generation of Liberals is agreeable to letting all members have a say in the running of the party's affairs, eventually there will be sufficient common ground to allow the leaders of the groups concerned to settle their differences within a single party, instead of splitting a vote which could conceivably elect a reform government in Ontario.

Grapplers pin Aggies but lose

Varsity Wrestling Blues have a perverted sense of hospitality. Blues gave visiting Federated College Aggies a 23-18 win in their grappling meet here Saturday, but not until they had thrashed their opponents in six of eight contested bouts.

In the statistically lacklustre, but physically colorful meet, Blues' strength showed OQAA championship. But after the smoke had cleared, the scoreboard read in Aggies' favor.

Of nine scheduled matches, Blues dropped three by default. This cost them a whopping 15 points and virtually assured their opponents of the win. While Louis Devereaux and heavyweight Ray German failed to appear, Clive Good was eight pounds overweight. Footballer German is still catching up on the books.

But the Aggies allowed Good to wrestle as an exhibition, and he won handily. And after Don Merker had scarcely worked up a sweat pinning his opponent in the 177-pound class, he outwrestled German's heavyweight opponent for a workout.

In other bouts, Larry Angus decided on defending OQAA 157-pound champion John Jansen. A year ago, Jansen had outfought Angus for the title.

Both 137-pounder Alvin McKenzie and 147-pounder John Holt exhibited fine form in winning their bouts by pins.

123 pounds — Keith Murray, OAVC, pinned Wayne Carney, Toronto Time, 8:50.

130 pounds — Clive Good, T pinned Paul Dermott, OAVC Time, 2:40. Dermott awarded match because Good overweight.

137 pounds — Alvin McKenzie, T pinned Bill Patterson, OAVC Time, 2:38.

147 pounds — John Holt, T pinned Tom Burnst, OAVC Time, 2:28.

157 pounds — Larry Angus, T won by decision, 6-2, over John Jansen OAVC.

167 pounds — Nick Shori, OAVC won by decision, 5-2, over Bob Griffith, T.

177 pounds — Don Merker, T, pinned Allan Hoyward, OAVC Time, 8:15.

191 pounds — Doug Brown, OAVC, won by forfeit over Louis Devereaux.

Heavyweight — Moe Sauve, OAVC won by forfeit over Ray German.

Puck Blues win...

Stray Shots — Ward Passi, Bob Awrey and Don Fuller each had three assists for Blues... The three stars were Steve Monteith,, Derbyshire and Passi, although every member of Blues' defence could have rated recognition.... Fuller suffered a bump on the head when handed a solid check by "Brent McNab" in the second period. He left the game but returned in the third period.... Steve Monteith is tied with Stan Sharman of Waterloo and Marcellin Tremblay of Laval for league leadership in goals. Each has scored six times. Sharman counted four goals against Montreal Saturday.... Bobby Apps of McMaster scored three goals against Queen's Saturday to bring his total to five.

All-American Tom Stuek paces Colgate swimmers to win over Blues at HH

By SHEL KRAKOWSKY

Tom Stuek, an All-American Swimmer from Colgate University, was a show in himself as he helped power Colgate to a 59-36 win over Varsity Blues in a dual swim meet at Hart House Saturday.

He entered two events, the 50 and 100-yard free style sprints. His time of 22.5 seconds in the 50-yard free style was one-tenth of a second better than the Intercollegiate record held by Dick Pound, formerly of McGill. But Pound still retains the honor as only records set in the OAAA championship meet are considered Intercollegiate marks.

But Stuek also broke another Pound record in the 100-yard free style, breaking the old record of 50.0 seconds by one-tenth of a second. This is an Ontario record so Stuek is eligible for recognition.

There is some speculation, however that the record will not be recognized by the Canadian Amateur Swimming Association since Stuek makes his turns in accordance with National Collegiate Athletic Association rules which are different from the C.A.S.A.'s.

Varsity only managed three wins in the 11 events, those coming in the 200-yard individual medley, the 200-yard butterfly and the 400-yard free style relay.

Graeme Barber was Blues' top point-getter, picking up a first in the individual medley, a second in the 500-yard free style and was a member of the winning free-style relay team.

Rookie Rob Campbell was impressive in winning the 200-yard butterfly and was also a member of the winning Varsity relay team as were Pete Richardson and Tom Verth.

BABY BUBBLES: Colgate used 20 swimmers in the meet whereas Blues only used a 12 man squad.

Pat La Forte, who won the diving for Colgate Saturday, has sent an application to U of T's Dentistry school.

Tom Verth has revealed that while at University of Indiana he was part of the Crest toothpaste survey. He used brand X.

Duellers take on three — and win all

Varsity Fencing Blues fought to their fifth major duelling triumph this season by scoring a convincing win Saturday at a quadrangle meet in Kingston. Blues won the tournament by a wide margin, defeating McGill 17-10, Royal Military College 19-8, and College Militaire Royale 27-0.

Coach Imre Hennyey's charges won 63 bouts against a mere 18 defeats overall. Outstanding Blue was Nansung Ho who captured all but two of his 18 foil and epee contests.

Unbeaten Blues have one more exhibition match before they attempt to recapture the OAAA championship February 8. On January 25 they play host to the Rochester Institute of Technology.

SQUASHED

Wally Ross only brightener for Varsity

University of Toronto's squash racquetters failed to get beyond the semi-finals in their quest for the Ontario Squash Team "B" Championship Saturday at the Toronto Badminton and Racquet Club.

Blues bowed to Toronto Racquet Club, 6-1, in the semis after sweeping two qualifying rounds. Before their elimination, they downed Toronto Lawn Tennis Club, 6-1, and the Carleton Club, 5-2.

Most noteworthy Blue was Wally Ross, who fought to overcome an early deficit in his first match, and sparked Blues to their walkaway win over TLTC.

INTERCOLLEGIATE HOCKEY ROUNDUP

McMaster loses edge but stays on top

McMaster Marlins maintained their position atop the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League on the weekend although blemishing their perfect record. Marlins tied McGill Redmen, 1-1, in Montreal Friday and then defeated Queen's Golden Gaels, 6-4, in Kingston Saturday.

Marlins have won three games and tied one for seven points in the standings, two more than Varsity Blues, who have played one less game.

In other games, Laval Rouge et Or defeated Waterloo Warriors, 9-3, Friday in Quebec and Montreal Carabins won over Waterloo, 8-5, Saturday in Montreal.

Laval and Montreal have each won two games and are tied for third place, one point behind Varsity. Carabins have a game in hand over Laval.

Pete Randle of Mac and Bernie Roy of McGill exchanged goals at Montreal Friday.

Rookie Bobby Apps scored three goals to lead Marlins over Queen's with John Savage, Gary Spoor and Randle counting the other markers. Bill Colvin, with two, Pete Weston and Frank Jodoin scored for Gaels.

Andre Hebert and Paul Doucet each scored two goals in Laval's 9-3 win over Waterloo. Yvon Paquet, Mercellin Tremblay, Michel Roy, Pierre Lachance and Gratien Guimond were the other Laval goal-getters.

Don Mervyn found the mark twice for Waterloo and John McLean once.

Stan Sharman of Waterloo netted four goals as Warriors lost to Montreal. Terry Cooke scored the other Waterloo goal.

Jean Delorme and Jean-Louis Mongrain led the Montreal attack with two goals each. Claude Chapleau, Paul Charbonneau, Jean Cusson and Richard Villeneuve were the other Carabin scorers.

Steve Monteith scored two goals for Blues Friday but he was also foiled three other times by Gael netminder Elwin Derbyshire. That's the case here.

McManus rates Blues' showing as the best in last 13 years

By PAUL HENDERSON

"That was the best game played in that place since I came here in 1951. It was terrific."

So stated Varsity Blues basketball coach John McManus enthusiastically after his squad had defeated Florida Southern College Moccasins, 91-82, in a thrilling battle before a vociferous capacity crowd at Hart House Saturday night.

"And Bordas was great," added McManus. "He won it for us."

McManus was referring to Varsity centre Ed Bordas, who scored 27 points and was a standout in rebounding, both offensively and defensively.

Bordas netted 10 field goals and four foul shots. Many of his tallies were scored in close after the 6'6" centre had picked off rebounds with an aplomb that nobody on the floor could match. Bordas secured 24 rebounds in the game.

Bordas was particularly brilliant in the fourth quarter when Blues forged from behind a 71-64 deficit to take the lead with six minutes remaining.

Varsity exploded for 11 points in a row to build up a 75-71 lead and then extended their margin to break the tight game open.

Up until the final minute no more than seven points had separated the two teams. Blues led, 47-43, at half time but Florida took the lead in the third quarter.

The lead changed hands five times in the first half and twice in the second half.

McManus used his five starting players throughout the game because, as the coach said, "they played so well and never gave up on defence."

Varsity captain Dave West contributed to the balanced Toronto attack with solid outside shooting and skilful ball control. Although he suffered an accuracy relapse in the third quarter, West's total of 28 points made him the game's top scorer.

Arvo Neidre, pressed into starting action after John O'Neill injured a foot in practice Friday, responded well to the call by scoring 16 points. Guard Bill Woloshyn turned in another steady performance and added 15 points.

Dave Ouchterlony scored only five points for Blues but was a standout offensively and defensively in close.

Moccasins, top-rated in their college league and possessing many fine players, were led by 6'3" Tim Eisnagle, who scored 24 points and executed numerous complicated movements with ease. He ranked with West as the second best player on the court behind Bordas.

Florida Southern guards John Wells and Bob Bowman were strong defenders and scored 15 and 13 points respectively. They tired in the late stages, however, and incurred a number of fouls in attempting to steal the ball from Blues and wrest a victory.

Under The Basket — Blues failed to take advantage of free throw opportunities, making 19 of 32 attempts. Moccasins hit on 18 of 24 for 75 per cent... Blues shot 44 per cent on field goal chances.

Both teams shot 50 per cent in the first half... Moccasins' Mike Huber terminated the first half by scoring on a hook shot from near centre court after a jump ball in the final second of play... In other weekend games, McMaster won its first, a 69-51 triumph over Queen's at Hamilton. Western defeated McGill, 72-37, in London... Waterloo trounced McGill, 98-39, in Waterloo as all-star centre Jerry Raphael counted 28 points and 23 rebounds for Warriors... Windsor Lancers took over first place with their second win, 97-45, over Queen's.

Blues — West (28), Bordas (27), Neidre (16), Woloshyn (15), Ouchterlony (5), Sheldon, Andrew, McKenzie, O'Neill, Baranowicz, Kimel.
Moccasins — Eisnagle (24), Wells (15), Bowman (13), Huber (11), Dawson (10), Shinkman (7), Shaw (2), Knappenberger, Schwartz.

KANE CREW HAS HABITS, ONE IS WINNING

Steve Monteith paces 5-2 win over Gaels

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues seem to have developed certain characteristics in their play so far this season. One of these "habits" has been a rather obvious tendency to play just well enough to win.

In most cases this has meant Blues have performed considerably below their potential, and Friday night's 5-2 conquest of Queen's Golden Gaels at Varsity Arena followed this pattern.

Blues have also developed a reputation of being a good first-period team and Friday's game ran true to form in this respect as well as Blues jumped into a 3-0 lead within nine minutes of the start.

Although Queen's was apparently weary from a long bus trip it is doubtful if any amount of rest would have helped Gaels. Their main problem was an essential lack of talent.

The visitors showed very little offensive punch and spent much of the game keeping Steve Monteith and company off goaltender Elwin Derbyshire's back.

The game started off fast, but after Blues scored their three early markers the pace slowed and play became ragged at times.

Chippy play was in evidence on the part of both teams and there were a few solid body checks handed out, especially by Queen's two big defencemen, Brent McNab and Doug Cunningham.

On Blues' side, Bob Awrey performed in his usual robust manner. He received a loud chorus of boos in the third period for a blatant charge of Gael Frank Jodoin. The check was reminiscent of Leafs' Eddie Shack.

The win was a big one in the standings for Blues as they picked up the point lost to McMaster Marliners when they tied McGill, 4-4. Marliners are two points ahead of Blues after playing to a 1-1 tie with McGill and defeating Queen's, 6-4, Saturday. But Varsity has one game in hand and can catch the leaders by defeating Laval in Quebec Friday.

Varsity's scoring again featured all-star right winger Steve Monteith, who netted two goals and could have had more if he hadn't been robbed by Derbyshire on at least three other chances.

Derbyshire frustrated Blues' hot Mop Line all game as he also performed grand larceny on Monteith's linemates, Ward Passi and Sonny Osborne. Osborne was foiled on three point blank tries by the 6'4" Gael netminder.

Bobby McClelland, Monteith and George Olah scored in that order for Varsity in the first period. Larry Dinsmore of Queen's counted the only goal of the middle period while Awrey served a penalty.

Doug Hunt of Queen's sandwiched Gaels' other marker between goals by Steve and Hank Monteith in the third period.

Skulemen refuse to pay fees before exam results known

Several first-year Engineering students plan to withhold payment of their second tuition instalment until they receive results of their Christmas exams. The final instalment is due today.

Professors in the faculty have indicated that the delay of results is due to a dispute over setting the marking curve for physics, a course given by the faculty of arts and science.

One physics professor told his class that the board which decides on examination marking and individual cases was undecided on how to mark a true-and-false question.

The professor said members of the board were at odds on what answers were to be accepted for 25 of the 50 true-false questions. He indicated the faculty of arts and science might not agree with a marking scheme proposed by the faculty of applied science.

Applied Science Faculty Secretary J. A. Gow said yesterday the faculty had posted a sign saying first-year results would be delayed until later this month "due to unavoidable circumstances."

Mr. Gow denied that his office adjusted marks, saying they were "entered as they were received." He admitted that it was "possible the marks are readjusted by individual teachers."

He said the failure would not be much higher than in previous years. Last year, 25 out of 453 students were advised to leave at mid-year. Thirteen did withdraw, and two of the others passed.

If the students do not have their fees in today, they are charged a late-payment fee. If the fees are paid on time, a student who is asked to withdraw cannot get a complete refund of his second instalment.

About $40 of the instalment would be forfeited.

Rumors in the engineering stores indicate that heavy failing in the physics course is expected, unless all papers are re-marked on a new curve. Results are usually out the first week of the new term.

Although marks are usually similar in apportionment from year to year, one professor told his class the top physics mark was 75. Other marks in first-year courses have been higher for many students.

The Pill? Well, we're not sure...

By CAROL PATTERSON

"I'm not in a position to have a position," a Roman Catholic priest said about birth control last night.

Rev. Stanley Kutz of St. Michael's College told a U of T Newman Club meeting: "It is a delicate situation as to where the line should be drawn, below which we would violate Christian beliefs."

Talking about the controversial birth control pills, Father Kutz said he didn't exactly approve of them, but added that the American inventor of the pills "hasn't been excommunicated yet."

"Responsible parenthood" now is in the Catholic vocabulary, he said.

"It is no longer necessary to have a large family."

"The way we teach values of the Christian church now may be subject to moderation."

"There are some bad reasons for having a large family. The husband might just want to keep the wife at home—or to prove that he is a real man."

Quoting heavily from an article entitled "Conjugal Love and Morality" in last week's issue of America, a Jesuit magazine, Father Kutz supported "with reservations" the concept of marriage as a "two in oneness," that "there must be love in sexual intercourse for it to be meaningful."

"Any interference with the natural completion is a falseness inserted in the couple's totality of giving. This is why the Church has insisted on a complete self-giving."

Again, Father, Kutz cited an authority, Dutch Bishop Bekkers, this time wholeheartedly. Rt. Rev. Bekkers supports reasonable spacing of children, consideration of the wife's physical and emotional needs, and no definite planning of the size of the family.

Father Kutz added that spiritual advisors should help give personal consciences a clear expression. "But it is from within human experience of marriage that decisions emerge."

Frozen fingers and feet were the order of the day yesterday morning as students lined up as early as 7:30 a.m. for tickets for the Ice Frolics and the Brothers Four concert.

Norm Talsky, Blue and White representative in charge of ticket sales estimated that between 60 and 70 per cent of all tickets were sold the first day alone. End-zone tickets were being bought as the SAC office closed at 5 p.m., Mr. Talsky said.

The crowd stretched as far as Soldier's Tower of Hart House, and the initial rush was not cleared until 9:45.

The compromise concerning block ticket sales that was arranged by the SAC and the Blue and White Society worked well, reported Mr. Talsky. Both sides of the Arena were equally sold for the shows, and although the best seats were all taken by 9 a.m., good seats are still available for both nights.

Urges Parliamentary freedom

By MOIRA HENDERSON

A brief calling for the removal of the Model Parliament from the guardianship of the University of Toronto Debating Union opened hearings of the university committee on student government Monday.

The brief was presented by Richard Tan (V Meds), chairman of the UTDU.

Asked about the value of Model Parliament debates, Tan replied:

"They definitely do produce results. Many issues supported by the Model Parliament are carried further, particularly through lobbying provincial and federal representatives."

Tan defended model parliaments as an instrument in raising student interest in politics, while admitting that the fate of campus parties is closely followed by the fate of their national and provincial counterparts.

Other changes would be a reduction in the size of the University of Toronto Debating Union executive, deleting positions which are at present unfilled, and the appointment of a full-time coach. The new executive committee would consist of the chairman, coach and team captain.

Sessions of the committee will continue this week in the conference room of the Students' Administrative Council building from 2 to 5 p.m. and 7 to 9 p.m. today and 2 to 5 p.m. Friday.

The sessions will be open to the public.

Grapefruit more emotional than orange

By DONNA KNAPP

Did you know that the average cola drinker is more immature than the average ginger ale drinker?

• that French-Canadians drive bigger cars than their English counterparts because they have feelings of suppression and a desire for power?

• that the Dominion Store butcher is so friendly because his company paid $10,000 to discover his female customers were afraid of him?

Dr. W. H. Muhattoo, vice-president of International Surveys Limited, speaking to the U of T psychology club Tuesday evening made these observations about the controversial field of marketing research.

Dr. Muhattoo gave some startling and often funny examples of the aspects which as simple an object as a common citrus fruit can assume.

Psychologists have discovered that a grapefruit is more emotional than an orange—and more intellectual—while an orange is more friendly, slower, and also a sign of a lower social status. Debutantes eat grapefruit, he said.

"It sounds silly, but it's big business. Research into subjects as seemingly trivial as these increased Dominion Store's meat sales by $4,000,000."

It is this research which underlies all radio and television commercials, all newspaper advertising and all "sales pitches" in magazines, the speaker said.

Dr. Muhattoo cited the best qualities of a good market researcher as flexibility and imagination.

Kremlinologists speak at law conference

The Students Law Society is sponsoring the First Annual Conference on Law and World Affairs to be held Jan. 17 and 18 at the Faculty of Law.

Topic of this year's conference will be "The Soviet-Western Détente: Cold War to Coexistence." The format will include panel discussions and student seminars, with several guest theorists taking part.

A limited number of application forms are still available at the general office,

Faculty of Law, for anyone wishing to take part.

Among those participating will be Professor Harold Ber- man of Harvard University, Professor Leon Lipson of Yale University and Profes- sor John Hazard of Colum- bia University, described by the society as the leading Kremlinologists of North America.

The conference will conduct an intensive study of the period of de-Stalinization in the Soviet Union and the state of East-West relations since the Moscow Test Ban Treaty, with special consid- eration of possibilities for co- operation between the two contending blocs.

The agenda calls for panel discussions by the guest ex- perts followed by seminars involving the students as well as the professors.

The climax of the confer- ence will come Saturday night at Hart House, when the Soviet Ambassador to Canada, Ivan F. Shpedko, will speak on "The Soviet Pol- icy of Peaceful Coexistence."

Vic tutor killed near Peterborough

Ian Dunn, a doctorate stu- dent at Victoria College was killed Saturday when his car swerved out of control on highway 115 near Peterbor- ough.

Dunn had been a tutor at Victoria for the past two years, and had made many friends among the student body.

Coming from UBC in the summer of 1962, he intro- duced a whole new concept of student-teacher relation- ships to Victoria College.

"His ideas on English liter- ature might perhaps have changed the study of the subject on the U of T campus, for he considered liter- ature as part of the con- tinuum, and did not hold with the current academic attitude of periodicity," Neill McRae, one of his students, said last night.

"All his students felt this way about him."

Co-op meets to discuss chequing rights

The Campus Co-operative holds a general meeting to- night in Hart House to de- cide whether to give chequ- ing privileges to members of its Credit Union.

Last year Co-op members indicated their desire for a credit union with chequing privileges, feeling $40,000 in deposits would be expected this year.

But this has not been the result, and the assets of the union now are only $10,000. About 20 per cent of the members now have deposits.

The Credit Union directors believe that this low re- sponse is due to the lack of chequing privileges. These privileges will cost the stu- dent 10 cents a cheque. Of this amount, 7½ cents is paid to the bank for clearing the cheque, and 1½ cents to the local credit union. Profit will not be made on the chequ- ing, but on the money drawn into the Credit Union.

The Co-op Credit Union re- ceived its charter in Decem- ber, and it is now up to the members to decide on chequ- ing rights. The directors hope that assets will increase considerably, if these chequ- ing privileges are accepted by the members.

Honor president of new B. C. University

The president of the new Simon Fraser University at Burnaby, B.C., was honored at a Hart House banquet last week.

Patrick D. McTaggart-Cowan was recently named pre- sident of British Columbia's newest university. He had given up his job as director of the federal meteorological service to head B.C.'s third university.

Simon Fraser was recently chartered by the B.C. govern- ment to handle, in effect, the overflow of students from the University of British Co- lumbia. UBC has upped its entrance requirements from 50 to 60 per cent this year.

The new campus promises to be one of the most modern — and costly — in North America, similar to the Uni- versity of Mexico in its ar- chitectural opulence.

The first science scholar- ship at the new university will be donated by transport department employees in honor of Mr. McTaggart-Cowan.

Decline hate sheet

The Hart House library committee has decided to de- cline acceptance of a com- plimentary subscription to The Canadian Intelligence Service—an extreme right wing publication published in Flesherston, Ont.

A committee member last night described the publica- tion as a "hate sheet."

He admitted the library committee purchases the Chi- nese Communist magazine Peking Review.

Next meeting the commit- tee will debate whether to accept Playboy into the read- ing room.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Query sales caster

Persons have queried the "sales caster" (the device that flashes messages across by lights) in the bookstore.

Some have wondered how much the machine cost and if an ordinary sign would not have been cheaper.

The caster was not bought by the store but belongs to the U of T Press which used it for sales promotions such as the display it runs at the CNE.

The bookstore merely borrows it when it is not being used and sets it up for the convenience of its customers.

It will be put to good use during the rush for books next fall.

The device is actually very simple in operation. A tape with the letters punched through it in the form of little holes runs over a set of lights.

The message shows through the tape.

Model UN assembly

500 high school students from 48 Metro Toronto schools meet on campus tomorrow for the 10th annual intercollegiate Model United Nations General Assembly.

Each school represents one member of the UN and their model assembly will discuss five topics: UN Charter Revision; Human Rights; Arab-Israeli problems; South-East Asia; and Technical Assistance.

They will be debated Friday in Sidney Smith Hall.

These students have been granted permission to meet in the legislative chambers of the parliament buildings on Saturday, although the U of T Model Parliament couldn't make it.

Student discussions held at high schools during the year are led by alumni of past assemblies — mostly young lawyers — until students are able to take over themselves.

The assembly ends on Saturday when, besides winding up business, a "Starvation Banquet" of a bowl of rice and a glass of water will be held.

Proceeds, which will obviously be large, will go to assist the Freedom-from-Hunger Campaign.

He stressed that market researchers are not magicians, nor are they the masterminds behind Packard's Hidden Persuaders, but merely psychologists, attempting to discover why the public prefers some goods over others.

The complaint commonly heard among any group of psychology students: "We can't do anything with just a B.A. in psychology," was thrown at Dr. Muhatto. He answered, speaking safely from behind an imposing array of letters, (B.A., B.S., M.A., Ph.D.) that the key quality of imagination was at least as impressive as post-graduate work.

Inquest is play winner

"Mr. Terpid's Inquest" took top honors at last weekend's One-Act Play Festival.

The original play by Ian Porter (III UC), directed by Bill Cameron (II UC), was the one adjudicator Eric Christmas enjoyed the most.

It won by a close decision after a two-hour committee deliberation, according to Mary Welsman (III UC), U of T Drama Committee chairman.

Now "Mr. Terpid's Inquest" will go to Ottawa to compete in the Canadian Inter-Varsity Drama League Festival, Feb. 12-15, held jointly by Ottawa and Carleton Universities.

Religion day Sunday

World Religion Day, uniting representatives of the major religious groups of the world, will be celebrated in Toronto Sunday.

Sponsored by the Baha'i Communities in the Metropolitan Toronto area, the observance will be on the theme: "World Peace Through Religious Unity."

The worship service will be held at the Northern Secondary School auditorium, 851 Mt. Pleasant Rd.

Readings from the holy books of many faiths will be presented by representatives of the various religions

disguised extortion

An article which was scheduled to appear in Monday's Varsity, written by a member of the Hillel Foundation and urging University of Toronto students not to contribute to the United Jewish Appeal was withdrawn at the last moment at the request of the writer, a first-year student.

The writer urged Jewish students to refrain from contributing and to dissuade their parents from contributing.

The basis of the criticism was not the appeal itself, or the way the funds were to be used. His objections concerned the methods by which the money was collected, and the means used to encourage contributions.

The United Jewish Appeal, like many other fund-raising drives, uses a rather spurious method of encouraging wide participation in its campaign.

The basis of the UJA is the White Book, an annual publication which lists all the contributors and the amount they have given.

This device is used by several organizations to increase the amount of contributions. The given idea behind it is that people will be encouraged to give more if they will have their name put in print, along with the amount they have given.

But the actual effect of this method is to blackmail people into giving more. If someone wishes to give a certain amount to the drive he will be placed in the position of having to give more.

If he was going to give $5, but knew that his peers were all going to give $10, and that his name would be appearing in print along with theirs, he would be subtly coerced into giving the same as them. This practice is particularly effective in a small community such as the Toronto Jewish community.

The reason the student requested the withdrawal of his article was that pressure had been applied on him to do so. The reasoning behind this pressure was that in the controversy the article was sure to arouse, the issues would become confused and the already persecuted Jewish community would be open to even more criticism.

We do not direct any of our criticism at the Jewish community. We are well aware of the fact that there are few, if any, communities that put their money to as good a use in the field of social welfare as do the Jewish people.

Nor are we intent upon singling out the UJA as a blatant example of this type of moral hypocrisy. The Toronto Daily Star, among others, carries out the same kind of drive for underprivileged children.

The reasons for all these drives are essentially the same — to provide funds for a worthwhile cause. But it is in the means of attaining their ends that these kind of appeals go wrong.

This question involves our whole approach to welfare. We can financially aid the underprivileged in two ways: through government support; or by private subscription.

But if we choose the latter method, we should at least be moral about it. If people will not contribute sufficiently because they feel it their moral duty, then we should probably provide financial aid with public funds.

But we should not have to stoop to disguised extortion and mental blackmail to obtain the needed support.

We agree with the writer of the unpublished article and we believe that the general public should refuse to contribute to appeals conducted in such a manner.

We realize that this type of abstention does nothing to help the people who need help, but we also realize that the best means of eliminating an appeal of this kind is to make it ineffective.

South Africa today

Government repression invites plotting and bloody race war

Approximately one out of every 12 adult South Africans is in jail today. It is possible, under existing law in the Republic of South Africa, to arrest a citizen with no charge whatsoever and hold that person incommunicado for 90 days, at the end of which he may be ordered held for another 90 day period, ad infinitum. The only person such a prisoner may see during the 90 day period is the federal minister of justice, who most likely signed the order to put him away.

In the Republic of South Africa it is a crime punishable by death to paint a poster or make a speech advocating any change whatsoever in the social or economic system of the country. The law does not spell out what sort of change is to be prohibited from public utterance—this is left to the government to define.

The South African government may declare a state of national emergency at any time, throwing the country into martial law and giving the government power to rule by decree. Certain areas of the country, such as the Transkei, have in fact been ruled in such a manner for extended periods of time.

Any person in South Africa not of the white race must carry on his person at all times a complicated set of identification papers and a pass to be in the area where he works and perhaps lives. This pass must bear the signatures and up-to-date authorizations of his tribal authorities, his employer, the local and national police agencies, and numerous other officials. An African may be arrested and jailed for up to 48 hours for simple failure to produce the pass on request—and who is to say whether or not he had a pass on him except the police who arrested him?

In the Republic of South Africa, the Communist Party has been banned since 1950. The African National Congress, the Pan-African Congress, and all other vehicles of native expression have been banned in the last decade. The opposition Liberal party, though not banned, is constantly harassed, and the editor of its fortnightly paper has been arrested. The only sizeable multiracial organization in the country, the National Union of South African Students (NUSAS) was recently raided by the government police and it appears that the government plans to ban NUSAS as well.

Books Banned

Some 4,000 books have been banned by the Republic government as unfit for the eyes of South Africans, white or black. Among the authors on the banned list are: Peter Abrahams, Richard Wright, James Baldwin, Nicholas Monserrat, D. H. Lawrence, Emile Zola, Françoise Sagan, Ernest Hemingway, Tennessee Williams, Roberts Graves, and John Steinbeck.

Most Canadians, though not familiar with the details of the South African situation are at least acquainted with the word "apartheid" and the philosophy it represents—complete separation of the races and dominance by the white minority in South Africa. In the words of the leaders of the Afrikaner Nationalist Party, the government party, apartheid is the means to "save civilization in South Africa." The Nationalists are frighteningly correct—for they have painted themselves into a corner with the paint of repressive social legislation, and it appears that there is no way out of the corner for South Africa short of violence.

The word "apartheid" was first coined for use in the 1948 South African elections, when Dr. Daniel Hanan, Nationalist leader of the time correctly surmised that the more extreme the call to racism, the more likely a victory at the polls in South Africa. The Afrikaner Nationalists won that election, and have steadily increased their majority in parliament since that time. The Nationalists have been in control of the country for more than a decade now, and have ensured their control by cutting those few "coloureds" on the voting rolls and adding in their place the votes of the white citizens of Southwest Africa, a League of Nations mandate to South Africa.

Lows Colled Uncivilized

Faced with increasing African unrest during the last decade as a result of government apartheid policies, the Nationalists have passed a series of laws, which in the words of the International Commission of Jurists, "surpass the bounds of civilized jurisprudence."

Ban Miscegenation

The first important legislative moves of the Afrikaner Nationalists were the Mixed Marriage and Immorality Act, the intent of which should be obvious from the title, and the Population Act, classifying the population by racial origin. Both acts were passed in 1950.

In 1958 the Strijdom administration eliminated the Cape Coloureds from the voting rolls, and secured passage of the Bantu Education Act, which totally segregated all schools in the nation and placed the control of education of native Africans completely in the hands of the government. Strijdom also originated the Criminal Law Amendment Act which virtually outlawed non-violent and peaceful demonstrations against the government.

H. F. Verwoerd succeeded Strijdom, and continues in office to this day. He immediately launched the government on a course of repressive legislation without equal in the world, including dictatorships of the left and the right.

Most important of these items of legislation are the Sabotage Act and the General Laws Amendment Act, which together have turned South Africa into a small scale replica of Nazi Germany.

Punish Any Protest

The Sabotage Act makes it a crime punishable by not less than 5 years with a maximum penalty of death to disrupt any public facility or service, commit burglary or trespass, or strike for higher wages and a great many other things, if the accused cannot prove his act was not intended to, among other things: cause or promote general dislocation, disturbance or disorder, further or encourage any political aim designed to bring about change in the economic or social structure of the Republic, and embarrass the administration of the affairs of state. The other "incidental" matters referred to in the act make it in effect illegal to protest the policies of the government in any public manner.

Under the Suppression of Communism Act, all newspapers in the country are required to deposit about $30,000 with the government, which is automatically forfeit if the government decides that the newspaper is furthering the "aims of Communism."

Other acts passed by the Nationalists are suggestive enough by their titles: the Public Safety Act, the Criminal Procedure Act, the Riotous Assemblies Act, and the Unlawful Organizations Act, among others.

Bantustans Farical

The Afrikaner response to charges that South Africa has become a fascist police state is that the government is in the process of assuring self-government and economic progress for the African through the creation of autonomous "Bantustans" throughout the country, to be infused with massive amounts of government aid. In fact, these Bantustans are and obviously will remain under the direct control of the national police. Together, the Bantustans, which are located in some of the worst geographical areas of the nation, constitute only 13 per cent of the land area of South Africa, on which about 75 per cent of the population is expected to live.

The two leading African organizations in opposition to the government are the African National Congress, headed by Nobel Prize winner Albert Luthuli, who is now under house arrest with all citizens prohibited from conversing with him or publishing his writings under pain of imprisonment; and the Pan-African Congress, a more activist and violent group, headed by Robert Sobukwe, who is currently serving a three-year term in jail.

The only organized white opposition is found in the Liberal Party, headed by Alan Patton and others. The Liberals have never succeeded in electing a candidate to parliament.

In other words, the situation in South Africa is such that it is totally impossible to follow a road of peaceful and non-violent protests against the government policy of apartheid. The only road open to the African majority is now through violence and civil war. The violent answer has been steadily gaining among the Africans, witness the ANC's losing ground inexorably to the PAC over the past few years.

Expect Civil War

The independent nations of Africa have begun to send assistance to rebels and violent elements in South Africa, and a civil war, a war that will probably surpass Algeria's in bloodshed, can be expected to erupt with a year or two. Given the fact that a civil war is already underway in neighboring Angola, a civil war in preparation in Mozambique, and rumblings of violence in Southern Rhodesia, the entire Southern portion of the African continent is likely to erupt into violence of the worst sort shortly. The League of Nations mandate of Southwest Africa is currently under review by the International Court of Justice at The Hague, and it seems obvious that the mandate will be returned to the United Nations, where the Afro-Asian bloc will most certainly push for action to take the territory from South Africa, by military force if necessary.

The South African government is preparing for war. All males in the country from elementary school age up are currently receiving military training, and the government is even considering the drafting of women into the army. Production of arms has tripled in the past three years.

The United States with some 3/4 billion dollars invested in South Africa, has to date refused to vote for strong action against South Africa in the United Nations. It would appear reasonable to assume that the U.S., along with Britain will be forced to "put up or shut up" on the South African question within the next year.

In order to enable students to obtain last year's examination reprints at the lowest possible cost, and to make it unnecessary for the student to purchase a complete bound set of reprints when he is only interested in the examination questions for three or four courses, the University of Toronto Book Department has arranged to prepare on special order in advance photocopies of examination papers at a nominal cost.

The following procedure has been established:

1. The student should place his order at the Stationery Department by filling out an order form.
2. The total cost of the order is prepaid by the student.
3. The student receives a numbered coupon, a date on which indicates when copies of the reprints can be picked up. (It is planned to photocopy orders at least twice a week, so that the average waiting period will be a day or two at most).
4. The cost of the reprints is 10 cents for the first page and 5 cents for each additional page for a particular course.

THE PROBLEMS OF UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT

By KEN DRUSHKA

The position, opinions and aspirations of the more than 1,000 teaching members of the University of Toronto are—to paraphrase Belafonte's song—clear as mud, but they cover the ground.

Unlike the students, the teachers have no officially recognized representative body in the university community. Formal recognition of faculty opinion is granted through the Senate, the university's academic body.

In addition, the teachers are prohibited by law from sitting on the board of governors, a point which now is being disputed at almost every Canadian university.

At the U of T the teachers' official actions are restricted entirely to those of an academic nature, through the Senate. However, this body is composed of such a wide variety and large number of persons that decision-making becomes swamped in bureaucratic red tape and the usual inefficiency problems of a democratic organization.

This problem has resulted in, first, decisions being made outside formal channels. Teachers with ideas of change must formulate, gain support for and finalize their plans behind closed doors within their department. The results of such negotiations are then presented as a fait accompli.

SYSTEM OPPOSES CHANGE

Changes are occasionally made in this manner, but just as often are squelched by the system, which opposes change. In such an arrangement one of the many established, conservative and influential faculty members can kill any changes proposed by more progressive teachers.

Secondly, the teachers can express some opinion through the Association of the Teaching Staff. The ATS, which is affiliated with the Canadian Association of University Teachers, has enrolled about 650 members of the U of T teaching staff.

Membership is one of the areas in which the ATS's problems begin. Basically, the ATS is fighting for academic tenure—the guarantee to teachers that they can investigate and expound what they wish, so long as they are doing a proper job of teaching—and a recognition of the teacher's position in the administrative sphere of the university.

In his annual report last year, the former CAUT executive secretary Dr. Stewart Reid, said, the legal structure of most Canadian universities prevented academics from exercising any influence upon the many problems facing the universities today.

"For the purposes of governing the nation, only Indians, habitual criminals, mental incompetents and judges are disenfranchised; for the purposes of governing the universities the ranks of the disqualified are swelled by including all the members of their academic staffs as well," Dr. Reid said.

TEACHERS ARE CONSERVATIVE

Dr. Reid pointed out a second problem. "Our membership is drawn from what can, without much fear of contradiction, be called the most conservative element in Canadian society.

"A built-in resistance to change seems to rank far ahead of the Ph.D. as a normal requirement for a university post, and it certainly is a requirement for promotion to the dizzy heights of an administrative appointment," he continued.

Generally speaking, those faculty members who do not belong to the ATS are the older teachers who have a full professorship and the tenure that goes with it. Most of them are sure of their position and do not want to see any changes. Many of them are opposed to faculty participation in the administrative area.

At the U of T as in most other Canadian universities, only full professors have tenure. Associate and assistant professors, lecturers and instructors generally do not. The CAUT regards tenure as a necessary condition of academic freedom.

"The object of academic tenure is clear enough: to secure the freedom of investigation and of utterance that academics need to do their job properly," an editorial in the December, 1962 CAUT Bulletin stated.

"That freedom is a simple necessity if the quality of our universities is to be improved or maintained," the editorial continued.

The CAUT, in cooperation with local faculty associations across the country, is investigating tenure practices and alleged breaches of tenure—a difficult proposition in the many cases where tenure does not exist.

TEACHER-ADMINISTRATORS

The issue of faculty representation on administrative bodies is a different and more contentious issue between teachers and administration.

The university is governed under a dual system: the board of governors handles the administration, the Senate takes care of academic matters, and never the twain shall meet—except in the person of the president.

The board of governors is a provincially appointed body which excludes academics from its membership. The structure is based roughly on the idea that money and academic matters should be separated, but as in most situations of this kind they are in fact very closely linked.

For example: is the decision to build an engineering or an arts building an academic or an administrative one? Obviously both are involved, but the board of governors ultimately makes the decision.

In addition, the board appoints the president, deans, professors, teachers and instructors. With the exception of the first position, the appointments cannot be made without the nomination of the president.

WHAT

Faculty—or at least quite straightforward: read and participation in appointment of departmental chairmen of departments.

As is the way with most reluctant to talk about Professor Bora Laskin, a professor in the faculty.

Prof. Laskin says—quite between faculty interests says there is no real conflict; they are a consensus; any teacher should participate more than he is permitted.

The breadth of this at U of T in 1962 and last spring.

But while Prof. Laskin, which exists between them, he does not explain. The answer lies in large man board of governors academic circles.

They like the system exists as an entity, which dispenses knowledge to the student.

SOME

But where Prof. Laskin other faculty members are ciferous. Many teachers' academic community imposed by a body that has.

The faculty association, for example, has support of university government calls for the DE FAC of university government.

These essentials include students and the appointment staff.

Prof. Laskin says that to allow for faculty participation the faculty association, if.

No pay but many benefits for SMC students aiding Mexicans

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

Do you sometimes wish that you could do something to help the less fortunate people of the world? Some students at St. Michael's College are doing something about it.

This year—as last—they are going down to Mexico to help the people there—people that are backward, poor, illiterate. Specifically, they are going down to build a road for a little town called Pisaflores, an Indian village about 200 miles north of Mexico City.

The village is only six miles off the main highway but is poor and isolated. Its entire economic problem stems from the fact that it has no road. It is accessible only by a two-hour ride on horseback.

The local parish priest also wants help in building some model homes (the people live in straw huts) and needs some girls to work in hygiene, nutrition and education.

This young Mexican stands to gain a great deal from the activities of St. Mike's students who are helping to build a road into his village.

It might seem easy to compare this to the U. S. Peace Corps but essentially it is different. Where the former organization is sponsored by a government as a purely political project, this one is undertaken by students themselves. It represents only the fact that these students have a desire to help.

Approximately 22 such groups operate from all over North America and last year a central organization (The Conference on Inter-American Student Projects) was formed to correlate their activities. But, essentially it is a project of individual groups.

The work runs throughout the summer starting in mid-May. Students may participate for as little as six weeks up to the full 34 months. Many who go will end up staying the entire summer simply because they like it.

There is no pay but the benefits are rich and many. Of course, one sees another country and people. Also one gets that sense of fulfillment possible only at the realization that one has helped where help was needed. You'll see the country but not as a tourist does. Rather you'll be living and working with the Mexican people.

But not just anyone can go. You can see that a trip such as this one might be interesting to certain adventurers. (Such people have made a mockery of the Peace Corps trips.)

Students going along here must be sincere. There's adventure, but of a different kind—the kind one gets from being in a strange place working with strange people.

Participants will have to meet certain requirements of language, spiritual and cultural qualities and medical fitness.

No, you don't have to be a divinity student with a working knowledge of Spanish. Far from it. However, you will be required to learn to use some of the common phrases of the language. Both boys and girls will be given a few classes to prepare them.

A holiday in the usual sense of the word it won't be. The Mexican customs are such that you'll probably not be able to date a Mexican boy or girl. Anyway you'll be working—wielding a pick, an axe, a hammer.

It might seem pretty hard and tiring but students who have been along are enthusiastic (to say the least) about it. Mark Connelly (I SMC) and Ann Schrand (III SMC) are two of them. Both are definitely going back this year.

All this even after a number of disappointing setbacks last year: ill-preparation by the Mexican authorities, mistrust by the peasants and ill relations with the people not at all helped by one young drunken individual.

But this year things will be different. With an early start at the preparations and the CIASP overseeing the projects, this year's trip is expected to be successful and rewarding to all involved.

Such groups can bring to the Mexicans the one thing that they need most—the initiative to get things done. They haven't got the getup and go to get started by themselves. They need a push.

Also, the Mexicans have a deep sense of pride. They won't take help. The Peace Corps doesn't go there, the Red Cross work is limited. The student groups must enter the country on a visitors visa or be turned back at the border.

Out of necessity, the bulk of the students have to be Catholic as there exists in Mexico a deep intolerance of anyone outside of that faith. However, students of other faiths may come; their help is needed.

It takes a person of special character to go along. He must possess a profound desire to help others as well as a strength of character within himself. They say that one of the chief tests of his strength is living and working together with his fellows from the university. Some of the nicest people turn out to be persons you would never associate with.

How would you compare?

Completion of the road to Pisaflores will help this woman who, at the present time must subsist by weaving on a crude loom such as the one shown above.

A hybrid sort of report from a hybrid sort of committee

By JOHN S. COWAN

The interim report of the House of Commons special committee on defence is as its name suggests, special enough. It is a strange hybrid sort of "report" which will certainly not resolve much of the confusion in defence which caused the committee's birth.

Despite its careful organization and elegant parliamentary style, the best that can be said for it is that it is irrelevant. More dangerous still, the impression is given that it is a unanimous report of all two dozen members. As the report is not consistent with the published views of some of its members, I can only assume that it is a majority report with some pretty outrageous aspirations. It is instructive to note that the majority of the members are (naturally enough) government members, and that even in the most blatant cases the report did not make any recommendations contrary to current government policy, even where all of the evidence presented to the committee tended to support a view contrary to the current "official" one.

This report is 19 pages in length, which should have been quite adequate to present a review of the evidence presented to the committee, along with the committee's related recommendations.

However, the first 41 pages were devoted to the composition, history and terms of reference of the committee itself, containing only one item of any value, which was a list of the names of the witnesses called to testify. At the end of that section the committee only recommended that it become a permanent rather than a special committee.

The next section of seven pages was a completely deadpan and uneditorialized listing of all the physical and financial data which make up a description of the department of national defence. This basic information (a) is made available annually in the report of the defence minister to Parliament, and (b) represents a point of departure for the committee, rather than an area the committee should have had to investigate. Instead it was the rationale behind that seven pages which the committee was supposed to be studying. For what they reprinted, all they had to do was to send someone down the hall to the Queen's Printer with 50 cents.

And herein lies the problem; the report contains nothing but the obvious. It contains only statements of the existence of those things for which the committee was supposed to find reasons for existing.

For example, point 39 states that: "Evidence further indicated that there has been for a number of years a progressive increase in the proportion of the defence dollar going to salaries, maintenance, etc., with a corresponding decrease in the amount available for the purchase of new equipment. The proportion of the defence dollar available for new equipment is seriously affecting the fighting capabilities of Canada's armed forces." And that is all they say on that point.

comment

Surely the idiots must realize that we know this, that there they have stated half the reason why they were set up; they must know that this is not news, that it has been known for years, that the problem was stated and statistics quoted, for example in SEE NO EVIL, by this author, some six months before the committee saw fit to say that the problem existed, and that the figures show this trend to be apparent as early as 1957.

What the blasted committee was supposed to tell us was who did it and why, and what they recommended to alter the situation.

The report then proceeded to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and continued to give the impression that the committee had done little else except read other government reports, despite the fact that much of the testimony given before the committee dealt extensively and well with the subjects on which they were expected to report.

The report says that it is questioned whether or not a limited nuclear war is possible in Europe or whether it would escalate into a major nuclear war. This is the committee's way of saying that the U.S., U.S.S.R., and a majority of independent strategiests do not believe in the possibility of limited nuclear war. The report goes on to tell how well prepared we are for a limited nuclear war.

Point 62 notes that the strike role of the RCAF in Europe was discussed. What they really mean is that it was challenged not only by the man who had planned it, Gen. Charles Foulkes, but by Gen. Guy Simmonds and John Gellner as well.

In the committee's recommendations was: "(d) A long range force role study to be immediately initiated to determine a most suitable role for the Air Division when its present equipment becomes obsolete." The Committee has recommended that a committee be set up to do what this committee was supposed to do. Indeed, as the Air Division's equipment is obsolete now, the report of this as yet unformed committee is needed by yesterday at the latest.

In point 75 it is written: "The Bomarc... are located on the northern fringes of the heavily populated areas of eastern United States and Canada and will provide a measure of protection for the population of these areas." This directly contradicts much of the evidence given before the committee, unless the measure referred to above is "not a bit". There is some doubt that the author of the report ever heard the word "overfinite". In practical terms it means that both the United States and the Soviet Union have nuclear capability sufficient to completely obliterate each other and allies at least 50 times over (figures, U.S. Congressional report). This means that any defence must be more than 98 per cent effective before it can begin to lessen any damage to be inflicted upon us. We have 56 Bomarc, and 64 Voodoo aircraft in this country. The Soviets have 1,600 bombers capable of reaching here, 150 ICBMs (no defence) and innumerable other weapons.

As Mr. John Gellner, prominent military analyst said: "If Bomarc make people in Toronto and Montreal feel more secure, then they may have some function. As far as military considerations are concerned, they are not relevant."

That is as appropriate a description of the committee report as it is of Bomarc. The committee should go back and try again.

Canadians must settle differences amicably

By CHARLES BEER

The widespread interest in French Canada among English-speaking universities continues.

Representatives from universities throughout southwestern Ontario held a conference last weekend at the University of Western Ontario. Jean-Luc Pepin, parliamentary assistant to Trade and Commerce Minister Mitchell Sharp, delivered two key addresses.

Mr. Pepin stressed the continuity of interest between French and English-speaking Canadians. He suggested that if we fail to settle our problems in an amicable fashion, it would be a serious blow, not only to Canada, but to other countries who are facing similar linguistic and cultural difficulties.

He based his talk upon two important viewpoints: First, the idea that Canada is, in a social context, a multi-cultural and multi-lingual country, while in the political and constitutional sense it is binational and bicultural. It is in this area that French-Canadians believe immediate attention is needed.

But Mr. Pepin did not feel the solution lay in revamping the British North America Act. Suggesting that to raise the problem of complete constitutional change would force all Canadians into a fratricidal war of words and cultures, he pointed out that the BNA Act could be used to prove anything and everything and that initiative and action would achieve more in other spheres.

He felt that the key to the future of Canada lay with the civil service. The bilingual school, already begun, could create a wave-like effect and aid the spreading of French throughout the other provinces. But his main hope dealt, not with legalistic and constitutional change — although this too would be necessary — but with the need for a moral awakening among English-Canadians with respect to Confederation.

In 1867 there had been a moral compact between the two founding nations, French and English. There was no suggestion then of a conqueror giving terms to the conquered. It was simply a matter of two cultural "nations" joining together to form one country. The onus for returning to this "spirit of confederation" will have to lie primarily with the provinces for they control the all-important field of education, and we will be increasingly aware of an era of more provincial autonomy, as already evidenced in the speeches of the present provincial premiers.

It seemed that Mr. Pepin was saying that you can only legislate the framework in which to allow the new spirit to work, but the nurture will have to come from all Canadians in all provinces.

On one point he was quite clear: He said that he represented the wing in Quebec which still possessed some effect in calming extremists, but if English Canada did not listen to him and others like him, Quebec would turn rapidly to the one road remaining—separatism.

Personally he felt that would be a tragedy for both Quebec and Canada.

An encouraging answer to his plea for active interest in Canada's problems was the conference itself. Each university read a paper covering many aspects of the "new" Quebec—education, industry, the church—and all showed an appreciation of Quebec's changing face.

The afternoon session ended with a spirited debate on the topic: "Resolved that Quebec should secede from Canada." The McMaster and U of T delegations spoke as the government, but lost to the new Canadian unity favored by the opposing University of Windsor.

The U of T delegation comprised Charles Beer, Richie Campbell and Bill Harris—all members of the Students' Administrative Council Canadian-Canadian committee.

Print evaluation of Slavic courses

A 30-page pamphlet giving a critical evaluation of Slavic Studies across Canadian universities will be one of the projects of the Ukrainian-Canadian University Students' Union during its 10th-year program, announced the newly elected president Andrew Gregorovich.

Mr. Gregorovich, a graduate of both McMaster and the University of Toronto, and now cataloguing librarian on the U of T staff said a study will be made of various calendars, differing courses, professors and special scholarships.

"The information should provide a synopsis of East European studies and would be revised every two years."

Mr. Gregorovich also revealed plans for a nation-wide essay contest with a prize of about $150.00, open to all students on the general topic of The Ukraine or of Ukrainian-Canadian relations from aspects of sociology, history, geography, literature, and so on.

Punch Kollins inks 'Triple K' Line of Kidd, Krakofsky and Kollins

After carrying a glum expression around the campus for the past few days, Rick 'Punch' Kollins, coach and general manager of the Varsity Inkmen, has finally cause to smile.

Punch, who has had difficulty signing his team for the Winter Carnival struggle with the SAC Fluffies, announced Tuesday he has come to terms with his feared 'Triple K' line of Shel 'Flash' Krakofsky, 'Killer' Bruce Kidd, the world's slowest quad racer, and Punch himself.

Terms were not announced but it is rumored that each man accepted offers in the neighborhood of $12,500. Punch also announced that he thinks he is close to coming to an agreement with P. O. 'Whirlwind' Maude, editor of the Varsity's Literary Issue, who is presently coaching the Austrian Olympic team for the Innsbruck games.

Until Tuesday, Punch's only signing had been that of Paul Henderson, who left the Detroit Red Wings to play for his old friend, Punch.

'Toe' Cunningham, coach and g.m. of Fluffies, has remained silent as to the make-up of his team, but certain rumors have leaked through to the knowledgeable hockey fans of the university. Doug 'Der Fuehrer' Ward and 'Leap-ing' Larry Ward are reported to have signed with the Fluffies and although terms are not known, it is believed they agreed to terms which are much higher than those being offered to the Inkmen.

Informed sources say Cunningham has managed to sign lovely Diana Bennett, the relentless march organizer, as

When asked whether he thought the use of a sex object by the other team would affect his team's play, Punch said, "No, no, I don't expect that sex will enter into the game. My boys are a clean-living bunch and I really don't think that the use of lovely girls like Miss Bennett will affect my team. However, we may pick up an excessive number of holding penalties. I expect us to rock, sock, bang and bash the Fluffies, whether they are male or female."

In the net: The Inkmen still have some personnel problems but they are gradually being ironed out. 'Jolting' Jim Laxer has been working out and claims he is in top shape.

The two main problems for Punch are holdouts Al 'Shut-out' Schoenborn and Steve 'Body-Basher' Barker, both of whom are still in violent disagreement with Kollins, in spite of several lengthy sessions.

...and in this corner

By SHEILA LITHWICK

Time: February 28, 1964.

You are in the Queen's University gymnasium. As you look about, a mass of multi-colored tunics are running about catching and throwing brown-leathered balls and jumping into the air under conical white nets.

The game: basketball.

Proudly erect on the table is the "Bronze Baby". If your team wins that they are the 1964 Intercollegiate Basketball Champs.

"No chance," you say, "those Western Warriors are too powerful."

"Nonsense," I scream, "Toronto has never been better."

Feverishly, I retreat with the echo of raucous laughter reverberating in my ear.

Remembering . . .

Dec. 7, 1963—Western Seniors defeated Varsity, 59-31, Western Intermediates over Varsity 34-31.

Jan. 9, 1964—Varsity dumped McMaster, 48-26

Ahh, I felt much better. Then . . .

Jan. 11, Western Seniors over Varsity, 64-25; Western Intermediates over Varsity, 28-34.

Oh joy, we had won a game against them . . .

Through my visionary trance flashed Blue and White bodies. Here's one that looks like Syd Fry. Surely Syd could score some more—she topped the league in '63 and still holds out as Varsity's best. Right beside her comes Sharon Dandy and Tina Cameron. Their line is dynamite, with Sharon slipping by for lay-ups and Tina grabbing yardward rebounds.

"So why not slaughter 'em," thought I, "when girls like Susan Jarrett, Naddy Lysko and Mary Oswald our basket."

Beside these six, walk 18 more whose skill is such that work and time can reap reward.

But suddenly the vision fades and Purple and White takes its place. The westerners are on the floor. The dark horse team charges to meet them in battle armor of Blue and White.

Unfortunately the story ends here because this writer is miserable at predictions. But nonetheless I see Toronto bringing strength and great potential to the coming tournament. Meanwhile, if their bodies ever overrule their minds, the Western Stumbling block might be surmounted and another championship tucked under their belts.

In Volleyball exhibition games, Toronto has won two matches over McMaster and lost four against Western.

The Westerners, 10-year champions of the league, display as much might now as in past years.

The Toronto volleyballers are a young group and have much to learn about competition play; however, if Western's strength were cast aside and Toronto team-play emphasized, the game would take on a new light for the young challengers.

COMING EVENTS.

Saturday: Interfaculty Ski weekend with 72 girls learning ski techniques at the Alpine Ski Club.

Saturday, 9:30 p.m.: Exhibition Fencing with Toronto playing host to McMaster and McGill.

YOUNGEST RINK

Varsity makes noise in bonspiel

University of Toronto is certainly making itself heard in the 59th annual Canada Life bonspiel, being held this week at curling clubs across Metro.

Varsity has only one rink entered in the bonspiel, and it is the youngest of the 448 rinks that started the elimination tournament. But the Varsity rink is now in the fourth round of play after eliminating Bernie Shuldice's Granite Club rink, 13-4, last night.

There are only 28 rinks remaining in the bonspiel, which winds up Saturday.

The Varsity rink, skipped by Tom Cushing (III For), is comprised also of Jim Creighton (III SPS), Doug Smith (I Gen. Sci.) and Bob Demcoe (I SPS). All are 21 years of age, minimum for entry into the bonspiel.

The rink has only been together since last Saturday after curling on two separate teams in the University league.

Some of the curlers already eliminated are among the best in the Metro area.

BIRD-BELTERS WANTED

Male students interested in trying for a place on the intercollegiate badminton team are requested to register at the Intercollegiate Office, Room 101, Hart House. Elimination trials will be held to select the four-man team for the intercollegiate championships at Western, Feb. 14 and 15.

John O'Neill added to disabled for games with U of B, Lancers

By PAUL HENDERSON

Varsity basketball coach John McManus takes his team to University of Buffalo today for an exhibition game that will serve to keep Blues sharp for the season's first showdown, the Toronto-University of Windsor contest slated for Friday night at Hart House.

Last year, Blues lost to Buffalo, 80-45 at Buffalo and two years ago they dropped a 78-44 decision in the same city.

McManus, pleased with Blues' excellent play against Florida Southern, is not pleased about his manpower situation.

John O'Neill (badly sprained ankle), Jim Sheldon (charley horse) and Nolan Kane (hairline fracture) are all on the limp. None is expected to play against Windsor.

JOHN O'NEILL
Ankle sprain forces him out.

McManus is particularly concerned about the loss of O'Neill. In a man-to-man situation, Blues are all right. "But if they (Windsors) throw a zone defence at us," said McManus, "we're in trouble without O'Neill's shooting."

With all the key performers returning from last year's Canadian Championship team, Windsor is bound to be tough. Lancers' most talented lettermen are Bernie Friesmith, Joe Green, Bob Horyath, Tom Henderson and Bill Brown. Green was an all-star forward on the 1962-63 Intercollegiate team.

In their enthusiasm over Windsor, many people are overlooking the other teams in the college league. Western and Waterloo both have the potential, to take top honors.

These teams displayed their strength last weekend. Western defeated McGill, 72-39, and Waterloo trounced the same team, 99-39.

Western boasts a strong forward line in centre Ken Barclay (6'4") and forwards Wally Dick (6'3") and Barry Mitchelson (6'5"). All-star Tom Williamson, the 1962-63 scoring champ, is Western's top guard.

Waterloo is led by all-star centre Jerry Raphael who finished third in scoring last season.

Toronto, Waterloo, Western and Windsor are all capable of winning the Intercollegiate title. As McManus puts it: "There will be some disappointed teams at the end of the season."

If Blues' play last Saturday is any indication, they do not intend to be one of the "disappointed teams." The result of Friday's contest will provide a good preview of the final outcome.

UNDER THE BASKET: One team in the league that is not in contention is McGill Redmen. Coach Ron Sharpe has lost lettermen Sy Luteran and Jack Walker to studies. The latter was Redmen's top man. Coach Sharpe has invited new prospects to practice, and all-star football lineman Dick Feidler has decided to toss his 230 pounds into the tussle.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

Vic ties UC for first place in hockey

By AL SCHOENBORN
Interfac Editor

Victoria College Scarlet and Gold, playing with the confidence of champions, trampled Senior SPS, 8-1, in Group I interfaculty hockey action Wednesday.

Stu Gresham and Les Foreman led Vic's rout of the bumbling Skulemen with a pair of goals each. Others were counted by Jeff Maybee, Jim Gilchrist, Bob Dewar and Doug Jones. Dave Mothersill was the only Engineer to find the range.

Vic's scoring outburst was the highest of the year and moved the Scarlet and Gold into a first-place tie in Group I with UC I.

In Group II, Trinity A has moved into first place on a pair of wins, coupled with a Meds A loss. Jim Edwards counted both goals for Trinity in a 2-1 win over Vic II, while John Watson replied for Vic.

Marc Bowden led the way with two counters in the other Trinity A win, a 3-1 decision over Dents A. Al Cooper counted the third tally for the winners while Paul Sunohara hit for the losers.

St. Mike's B got into the win column after three consecutive losses with a 6-2 win over Meds A. John Gilbert paced SCM with a pair, while Mike Doyle, Bob Duggan, Norm Mealing and Stan Pineau netted singletons. Bob Smith and Don Stemp counted for the doctors.

Law continues to run away in Group IV. Wednesday, the law-ers won their fourth in a row, defeating Forestry A, 4-0.

INTERMEDIATE DOINGS:
Vic X 4, SMC F 2; UC IV 5, Trin D 1; Vic IV 4, SPS III 0; SPS I 5, SMC C 1.

BASKETBALL

A Saturday night exhibition match saw Medicine A, currently leading Group II, upset leading UC I of Group I, 59-52.

John Maki was outstanding for the winners as he hooped 26 points, followed by Gerry Goldman and Priti Pallopon each with 10. Alby Garbe led the losing Redmen with 14 points while Peter Peskun and Andy Birrell were close behind with 12 and 11 respectively.

Jr. SPS moved into a tie for the Group II lead on the strength of a 40-21 win over PHE II. Viido Worang paced the skulemen with an 18-point effort.

New College suffered its fourth straight setback in Group III as the Green and Gold fell 27-25 to Architecture A. Brian Randall hooped 10 for the winners, but Rod Osborn was high man in the game, scoring 11 points for New.

Intermediate and Minor league basketball got underway this week. St. Mike's C took UC III, 32-20, and St. Mike's D edged PHE III, 36-34, in overtime. Minor league contests saw UC Molecules A crush Vic Commerce, 36-15, while Splats outscored Vic Yogi Bears, 34-19.

But beware--Laval jinx also looms

By GORD BELLMORE

Varsity Hockey Blues have an excellent chance to move into at least a first-place tie with McMaster Marlin's when they travel to La Belle Province this weekend for games against their two French-Canadian opponents, Laval Rouge et Or and Montreal Carabins.

McMaster has only one game scheduled this weekend, a Saturday contest against McGill Redmen in Dundas, Ont. Blues trail the leaders by two points in the intercollegiate standings and after the weekend both teams will have played the same number of games.

The road trip is Blues' last eastern swing of the season and the last time they face the tough task of playing two games on consecutive nights. Because of the revised seven team league, Blues only make two eastern trips during the season instead of the former three.

The really significant concern for Blues is the grim prospect of playing the important Friday night game with Laval in Quebec City. It isn't enough that Rouge et Or can slip into second place, one point ahead of Varsity, by winning, but Blues also contend with what has become known as the "Laval jinx."

Simply stated, the "jinx" is the fact that Blues can hardly beg, borrow or steal a win in the Quebec capital. In the past four seasons, Blues have managed only one win on Laval's home pond, a 6-3 victory in 1961-62. And during the past seven seasons, Blues have won only three games at Laval.

DON TAYLOR
Two-letter man.

Former coach Jack Kennedy was at the helm when Blues salvaged their last win at Laval, but present mentor Joe Kane, not a superstitious man, received a rude introduction to the hex last season. Rouge et Or, en route to the Eastern Division championship, dumped the Toronto crew, 8-4 and 7-3.

Blues have only one chance to break the hex this season because of the new seven-team alignment, and Friday's game is it.

The following night Kane's crew can't afford a letdown against the surprising Montreal Carabins. Carabins are undefeated in two games, one of them a 4-2 win over McGill Redmen. These same Redmen tied both Blues and McMaster.

Carabins are tied with Laval for third place, giddy heights for the usually low Montrealers.

Stray Shots—Victoria College of the interfaculty league has donated its goaltender, Bill Bowen, to Blues. Bowen will accompany Blues to Quebec as second goaltender behind Gary Aitken. Former goalies, Larry and Casey Soden, have left the team. McGill Redmen have lost the services of five-year veteran Dave Flam for the season and Skippy Kerner for an indefinite period. Flam broke an ankle last week in practice and Kerner fractured a cheekbone when hit by a puck during the same practice. Both Flam and Kerner played on McGill's third line with Ron Doleman. Don Taylor, an all-star veteran with McGill football Redmen and brother of hockey Redman Johnny Taylor, has joined the club and will play with Doleman and Doug Carr on McGill's third line.

SANDY KOUFAX IS A CONSPIRATOR

Deserved recognition is too seldom given to great men who spend fruitless years attempting to expose gross frauds in amateur and professional sports. These men, sportswriters, humanitarians, philosophers, educationists, scientists, are aware of the fraudulent facts and try to inform the public. But they go unnoticed and unrewarded.

One such individual is Ernest Lowry of 22 McGill Street, Toronto. Mr. Lowry, who operates "Ball-flight Research . . . The Most-Widely Publicized Authority On This Subject In North America," has taken up a personal crusade to inform the people of Canada and the United States that they are being taken, tricked, fooled when they believe that a baseball thrown by the likes of Sandy Koufax, Whitey Ford and Warren Spahn actually curves in flight before it reaches the batter.

Mr. Lowry has approached the governments of this country and the U.S. with a plea that this "curve-ball scandal" be exposed once and for all and that all literature professing to instruct how to throw a curve ball be banned. But Mr. Lowry has been ignored in his great crusade. He has failed to gain the recognition he justly deserves, recognition that has been acclaimed for such great men as Alexander Graham Bell, Frederick Banting and Jonas Salk.

Last October, Mr. Lowry wrote to Prime Minister Pearson, suggesting that the prime minister release an immediate statement in the House of Commons that "Canada has been placed in an internationally-embarrassing position resultant of our nationally-owned CBC network staging purportedly-genuine proof-of-curve test."

Mr. Lowry believes that since a demonstration of the curve ball was given on a CBC network show, sponsors accepted the curve ball "as authoritatively endorsed as factual by the Canadian government."

WE ARE JUST AS GUILTY AS THE REST

Ernest Lowry has been man enough to state publicly that the curve-ball myth is only geared to the sale of "curve-ball instruction books" and sponsors are being led into a dangerous form of advertising because it can be proven that such instructions are utterly fictitious and harmful.

"Certainly Canadian-American sponsors will want no part of being associated with any form of mass-deception of the public," Mr. Lowry stated in his letter to Mr. Pearson. And recently Mr. Lowry charged Mr. Pearson and his government with keeping the issue hushed up so that the electors won't learn about the curve-ball scandal.

We, as mature university students, certainly can acknowledge the importance of the work of Ernest Lowry. But we are just as guilty as the government, the press and the radio and television networks because we have done nothing to rid the sporting world of this scandal.

If sports are to remain wholesome, clean and worthy of our children's time and efforts, we should insist that a Royal Commission be established to clean up this hoax. Who knows what a Royal Commission might uncover? As one member of the Varsity staff believes, the curve ball is a conspiracy led by Communists. For all we know there may be numerous other hoaxes in the sporting world that we are not aware of.

Baseball players and experts themselves have, in subtle ways, admitted that they are perpetrators of a hoax. Sal Maglie, a former great "curve-ball" pitcher with the New York Giants, was quoted as saying: "I don't believe there is such a thing as a good curve ball hitter." What Maglie actually meant, of course, is that there is no such thing as a good curve ball hitter because there is no such thing as a curve ball.

This whole controversy would never have evolved if the FBI and the RCMP had examined the credentials of one man 100 years ago. You've probably never heard of "Candy" Cummings, but he was the first person who claimed he could make a pitched ball curve on its way to the plate. If Cummings had been interrogated by the authorities we would now be free of this major scandal.

But it is still not too late to act. And when the atrocity is finally eliminated, Ernest Lowry should receive his due reward as a tireless crusader for truth and justice. The only proper recognition would be to enshrine Lowry . . . perhaps in Siberia.

The Baseball Pitcher
Just another hoax

Tennis? table tennis of course

Table tennis is regarded by most as just an enjoyable parlor game that can be played in the home if one is fortunate enough to have a large recreation room.

In U.S. colleges, however, table tennis is played on the intercollegiate level. It is regarded as a sport that demands speed, quick reflexes and superb concentration.

At present there is a table tennis club in operation at Hart House but the sport is a long way from being admitted to the intercollegiate program. It is hoped, however, by the Hart House club, and especially by club secretary Bill Jackson, that the sport will some day gain intercollegiate recognition.

With this thought in mind the Hart House Table Tennis Club is inviting all interested students to enter the all-varsity table tennis tournament, Saturday in Hart House gym at 10 a.m. Entrance forms are available at the Hall Porter's desk in Hart House and there is an entrance fee of 25 cents being charged.

Favored to win this year's tournament is Narc Borodcycak (IV SPS). Also rated highly are Joshua Bamisaiye (III York) and Danny Strub (III Meds).

ALL-STAR GRIDDER, MAT CHAMP

German breaks ankle in wrestling mishap

Ray German, an all-star linebacker with Varsity football Blues, suffered a broken left ankle last night while practising with U of T's wrestling team.

German, who was the intercollegiate 191-pound wrestling champion while at OAC last year, suffered the fracture while grappling with Varsity teammate Don Merker. German's foot got caught when he attempted to take Merker down to the floor.

The 22-year-old fourth-year Engineering student will be in a cast for about one month.

German was an outstanding fullback, centre and linebacker with OAVC in the Ontario Intercollegiate League for three seasons before transferring to Varsity last fall. In his final season with Aggies he was drafted by Montreal Alouettes of the Canadian Football League.

German was a co-captain with Blues in his first season and was chosen as an all-star linebacker by both the intercollegiate league coaches and the Canadian Press.

He had only resumed wrestling the past few days after writing mid-term examinations.

Ideas bombard SAC hearings; suggest Varsity leave SAC

The Students' Administrative Council university committee hearings this week have heard from students and administrators such suggestions as:

- Place five SAC-appointed members on the university board of governors.

- Remove the Varsity from SAC administration and make it an independent paper to be sold to the students.

- Publish an "anti-calendar" giving critical comment on the courses offered.

- Have each member of the SAC represent 300 students, while still allowing each college and faculty the same number of votes it has now.

Submissions have come from all quarters of the university community — student, staff and administration. Some have concerned the SAC itself, while others have dealt with other areas of student activity.

Stu Goodings of Massey College, former national president of CUS, praised student government at U of T and commended the committees for doing their work efficiently.

He went on to make the first three proposals noted above, as well as suggesting that the word "administrative" be eliminated from the council's title, and that full-time workers be hired.

Dave Beatty (III Trin) criticized misrepresentation on the council.

"Following a study of the Students' Administrative Council composition I found that one person represented 1,362 people in University College, while on represented 32 in Food Science."

He recommended that composition be changed so that each member would represent 300 students, so that UC would then have five reps instead of two. Each faculty would retain its present number of votes.

"With the increased number of representatives, more people could do committee work," he said. "Also, with the time saved in meetings more time could be spent in debate, and then the 'rubber-stamp' criticism would not be valid."

Jeff Lyons (III Law) proposed several Model Parliament reforms.

"One - third of the 108 Queen's Park seats should be proportionalized, to give recognition to the total number of a party's votes," he said.

"Constituencies should be limited to 300 students. In that way, independents would have a better chance of running for election."

A brief submitted by two St. Michael's Colleg students, Cynthia Kappus (III SCM) and Ann Schrand (III SMC) argued for a more representative and less administrative council.

Popular elections, campaigning of SAC candidates for presidency, and lobbying for a student centre were cited as measures to increase participation at the expense of administration.

However, Joseph Evans, former U of T registrar, presented an opposite viewpoint. He held that "rep by pop was unworkable in a university scene," and that "students spend too much time asking for power without knowing what to do with it."

Workmen cope with mound of sludge behind SAC office, dumped there earlier by snow removal teams.

Favour throne speech

By SUSAN STUMPF

The new department of university affairs announced in the throne speech Wednesday has met with favorable reaction from various members of the University community.

The proposed department will act as a liaison between the Government and the universities, and together with the advisory committee on university affairs will deal with grants and other university matters. A crown corporation to assist universities with their capital financing programs will also be set up.

"I welcome the establishment of this new department," Dr. Claude Bissell, University of Toronto president, said Wednesday. "It is an indication of the Government's special concern for the universities and their problems, and a recognition of the fact that, although the universities are closely related to the primary and secondary schools, they are deeply involved in other areas—in particular research, scholarships and professional education."

Speaking of the proposed crown corporation he said: "I think the Government has acted wisely in adopting this proposal. The capital needs of the universities will be enormous, particularly in the next 10 years. It is in the long run prudent and economical to meet those needs as completely as possible."

The proposed legislation will help the Government to do this."

Reservations concerning the new legislation were expressed by Rev. E. Carlisle LeBel, vice-chancellor and president of Assumption University in Windsor.

"We're delighted, but we wouldn't want to come under government control of our academic program," he said.

But he added: "We're confident that the department will make no attempt to interfere with the academic freedom of each institution."

Donald MacDonald, leader of the New Democratic Party, also expressed doubts. "If this raises the prospect of an unwarranted interference with the traditional autonomy of the universities then it is a questionable move, and the establishment of more full-time personnel in the department of education to provide the necessary leadership, liaison and coordination would be preferable," he said.

SAC president Doug Ward said he was delighted to hear of the establishment of the University of Guelph, also announced in the speech—"Something that has been needed for a long time" he added.

"However, I will withhold judgment until the function and activities of the Crown Corporation and the Department of University Affairs is expanded upon," Ward said.

"In as much as it recognizes the particular needs of the universities, it is a step in the right direction," Ward stated. But he wondered what controls over capital expansion there would be under the new crown corporation."

John McCarthy, secretary of the Advisory Committee on University Affairs said "the new department, as separate from the the Department of Education, gives recognition to the particular problems of the universities," but "it is inevitable that there will be a close relationship between the Department of Education and the new department."

UC Lit still struggles for quorum

The continuing efforts of the University College Literary and Athletic Society executive to pass a new constitution for the society met with only partial success Wednesday.

A combination of determined opposition to some of the features of the new constitution and the difficulty of getting and keeping a quorum caused adjournment of the open meeting after only the first three articles had been voted on.

Phil Epstein (III UC), president of the Lit, said Thursday that a second open meeting will be held today at 1 p.m. in the West Hall of UC to attempt to dispose of the remaining articles.

Perhaps the most significant change being sought is the abolishment of the mandatory open meeting. Under the present constitution at least three open meetings per term must be held, and the executive has found them a thorn in their side because of poor attendance.

Bruce Lewis (II UC) proposed changes in the executive structure of the society to make it more representative of the students. He said this was necessary if the open meeting was to be done away with.

Lewis' proposal would have added 22 "tribunes", members without portfolio, to the 18-member executive. The amendment, however, was voted down by the meeting.

After the meeting Lewis charged that Epstein "took every measure possible to limit, hinder, and curtail debate on the new constitution," and the speaker, Colonel C. P. Stacey of the history department, with being "either in active collusion with the president or at best woefully incompetent."

He claimed that Epstein disregarded the rules of parliamentary procedure while "attempting to ram through the changes with less than a quorum of 50 out of 2,000 members."

He added that Col. Stacey "repeatedly recognized the president so that he could move to cut off debate, that he 'repeatedly interrupted speeches opposed to the President's proposals, and that he 'twisted the rules of procedure so as to prevent proposals opposed to the president's from being moved or fully discussed."

in not playing the Queen alone.

The SAC had ruled earlier this month that O Canada was to be the official campus anthem, making no provision that both might be played at an official function.

The University of Toronto Drama Committee, the first organization to sponsor an official university function since the SAC ruling, was forced to make a compromise between tradition and ruling.

Mary Welsman (III UC), UTDC chairman, said last night that in the future it would be better to have one before and one after the performances. She did not specify which should be played first.

Will play the Queen AND O Canada now

Ask Ottawa for tax exemptions

A brief presented this week by the Canadian Union of Students to the Royal Commission on Taxation called for increased financial help to university students and their fee-paying parents.

The underlying theme of the brief was a recognition that "if Canada's interests are to be best served, the university must be made accessible to all, having regard only for objective standards of ability and irrespective of economic circumstances."

It was suggested that tuition fees paid on be-half of students by parents or guardians be deductible from their income tax. CUS contended that the present ruling which allows only the student this concession is inadequate, since it benefits only those who earn more than the $1,100 exemption allowed everyone.

The plan-further proposed to increase to $1,200 from $950 the amount a post-secondary-school student could earn without losing his dependent status, and to increase to $1,200 from $550 the deduction for post-secondary-school dependents.

General recommendations included:

- 1) A basic deduction of $3,000 per year for students.
- 2) The application of tax exemption laws to part-time students.
- 3) A proposal that money for scholarships set up by industries and individuals be made deductible under certain circumstances.
- 4) Exemption of transportation costs incurred by students attending the nearest university offering instruction in one of the two official languages of Canada. The exemption would be void if there were universities with the desired course of instruction within a reasonable proximity of the student's residence.
- 5) Transfer of control over certain tax fields from the federal to the provincial governments in order that the provinces might have the financial means with which to perform their educational services.
- 6) A suggestion that every effort be made to ensure that a Canadian take his post-graduate work in Canada.

The brief was presented on the same day that Dr. John B. MacDonald, president of the University of British Columbia, released a report predicting an increase of up to $100 in student fees in the next three years.

WUS starts drive for 6,000 books to go abroad

Six thousand textbooks and $600 to be collected by Jan 24.

That is what the University of Toronto World University Service hopes to raise during its five-day textbook drive for underprivileged overseas university students starting Monday.

To take the books, giant barrels will be posted in all parts of the campus. With each book WUS hopes to collect a dime which is the amount needed to cover the cost of freight. One dime sends one book overseas.

WUS, in the first such campaign at U of T, proposed the idea of gifts-in-kind as the most effective way of helping underprivileged overseas students. At the University of British Columbia a similar campaign recently reaped more than 6,000 texbooks and dictionaries.

Of the 50 countries served by WUS, the most needy are the young African nations where extreme book shortage has resulted in the establishment of book exchanges to loan books to students. WUS reports that heaviest demand is for science textbooks.
Grade 13 text-books, dictionaries and scientific journals are also being asked for.

Thanks to WUS, the University of Algiers has been able to make a start in restocking its library which was gutted by fire. But thousands more books are still needed at Algiers University.

Even before it has started,
the campaign has been assured of success. Toronto publishers Clark, Irwin have given their blessing by donating the first 1,000 textbooks.

Books will be distributed through WUS International in Geneva which acts as clearing-house for requests from universities. In special cases WUS in Toronto will supply books direct to overseas universities.

Condemn advertising ethics at debate

By ANDREW SZENDE

"It is difficult to determine whether this is a debate or a trade fair," Speaker I. G.
Scott commented at last night's Hart House debate.
The topic for debate was "Modern advertising has no ethics."

The resolution was upheld

32 to 28 despite the fact that the honorary visitor spoke briefly against it.

W. H. Graham, vice-president and director of the Mac Laren Advertising Company, maintained that modern advertising does have ethics simply because it is part of a society which also has ethics.

He denied that advertisers try to mislead the public. He said words like "smoothest" and "best" are the vernaculars or idioms that we use all the time.

He said that the function of advertisers is persuasion.
"We examine the ethics and interests of society and appeal to them."

G. D. Kelly (III Vic) arguing for the resolution stated that advertisers help create, conformity, status-consciousness, and an exploitation of sex.

J. F. Godfrey (III Trin) retorted that people are naturally conformists; they like to keep up with the Joneses; and are sexy—the ads only keep up with the people.

Two members of the audience attracted unusual interest despite the fact that they did not take sides in the debate.

They were author Morley
Collahan, who had participated in the first Hart House debate in 1924, and MP Marvin Gelber (Liberal York South).

Accident victim

ployee of Daisons Press Limited which prints The Varsity, was in critical condition in hospital last night with head injuries suffered earlier yesterday when a truck he was driving to the U of T swerved and hit a parked transport.

Nensis 2 weeks late

The graduate section of this year's Torontonensis will come out at least two weeks later than originally planned, according to editor Tony Orav (I APSC).

The first section will contain graduate portraits.

Orav blames the delay on a lack of co-operation on the part of the graduates. "Many grads don't know what they want," he said on Wednesday.

He said he was hopeful that the book would be ready by mid-March. Some grads have not even handed in their biographies which are to appear in the Nensis along with their pictures.

For the first time this year the Nensis will be published in two sections.

The second section, called the "Activities" section, will be ready before the annual examinations get under way in April, Orav promised.

But he complained of a general apathy toward the Nensis by students.

He stated that at some meetings of all faculty and college representatives only one or two show up.

He warned that "the amount of coverage of faculties and colleges will be directly proportionate to the amount of co-operation they give."

Co-op votes chequing rights

A Wednesday meeting of the 200-member Campus Co-operative voted to give members of its new Campus Co-operative Toronto Credit Union chequing privileges, and right to borrow up to $1,000.

The credit union's charter limits membership to members and associate members of the Campus Co-operative itself. Exact definition of the term "associate members" will be decided by the Co-op members at their semi-annual meeting in February.

A $5 share admits both types of members.

The charter requires that all union directors be over 21 of age, and not elected members of any Campus Co-op body. The credit union is not a part or possession of the Campus Co-op, but can be entirely directed by co-op members.

The age and elective rulings have forced the Co-op to place alumni (over 21 and associate members) on the board of directors of the union. The five directors, whose terms of office will ensure continuity of control and direction, were elected by the Co-op members.

The union's assets, depleted after students paid their second fee instalment, were $9,500 this week. For every two dollars assets, the union will be able to borrow $1 from the Ontario Co-operative Credit Society. The money can then be re-loaned at a rate of interest determined by the credit union directors.

Persons 21 or over may borrow up to $200, if they have two witnesses over 21. Those under 21 can borrow up to $200 provided they have two co-signers over 21. For loans up to $1,000, borrowers must have two co-signers while loans over $1,000 require security.

"This service will be a great help to students just graduated," Co-op Executive Director Howard Adelman said. "They will still be able to use the credit union when they have graduated."

The charter, controlled rigidly by the provincial government, requires the union be inspected annually by an external auditor.

A ten-cent charge for each cheque written will be made. Next year, if the union remains a member of the Ontario Credit Union League Ltd., (it voted to join Wednesday) a per-capita levy of $1 will be charged for membership.

The Co-op next presents its case to SAC.

Urge low TTC rates for students

All undergraduate students at universities and technical schools should be eligible for special TTC rates, a North York Councillor suggested last Monday.

In a notice of motion, to be discussed next Monday, Councillor Gordon Hurlburt noted that students at schools and universities qualify for special rates up to the age of 18.

SAC president Doug Ward (III Emm) has indicated that he will attend the meeting next Monday to support Councillor Hurlburt's resolution.

The special rates are nine tickets for $1. Students over 18 must now pay the regular six-for-$1 rate.

Mr. Hurlburt told The Varsity that first unofficial reaction from the TTC was one of opposition.

He said the TTC feels there would be a great deluge of students taking advantage of the lower fares and it would increase the number of people using buses and street cars during the rush hour period.

TTC Chairman Ralph Day told the Varsity Thursday that he "would be glad to do it if someone paid the necessary subsidy."

"I am not concerned with where the money comes from, as long as we get it," said Mr. Day.

the new department

The encouraging, if belated, decision of the Ontario Government to establish a department of university affairs is probably the most important program outlined in Wednesday's speech from the throne.

The program is an indication that the provincial government has finally recognized the specialized needs and problems of Ontario universities; and has finally decided to do something concrete about them.

But the proposals are not yet to be greeted as the cure-all for the university problem, or as any great advance in government-university co-operation. By the same token, the move cannot yet be regarded as a possible encroachment on the independent status of the universities.

These questions will only be answered when further details are released by Queen's Park. However, there are a few indications and factors which now are pertinent to the situation and what may be expected to come in the future.

The history of university-government relations in Ontario is vague and complex. For many years the universities dealt with the government on an individual basis and through no particular department.

Five years ago an advisory committee on university affairs was formed, which co-ordinated the university-government negotiations.

But with the rapid expansion of the last five years this advisory committee proved itself inadequate, and it became obvious that a different arrangement was needed.

The recent fear of university presidents has been that this arrangement would be through the department of education. It was generally felt that because of its lack of familiarity with university affairs, this arrangement would prove detrimental to the universities.

In addition, a strong current of opinion holds that university and public school administration are essentially of different natures, and therefore should be handled separately.

From the sparse governmental statements pertaining to the proposed ministry, it has been determined that there will be a close connection between the university affairs and education departments.

It has also been reported that the Minister will probably be either the minister of education, William Davis, or the premier, John Robarts, a former minister of education.

Thus, the close ties with the department of education already appear to be established.

The question which now remains is, how close the actual ties will be when the department is put into operation.

For instance: From where will the civil service staff for the department be drawn? Will they be culled from the secondary-school oriented department of education, from the universities themselves, from outside sources, or a combination of all three?

What will be the scope of the department and how closely will it scrutinize the financial allocations within the individual university's budget?

And why is there not—if such is the case—a separate portfolio being created, instead of the minister being either the present or a former minister of education.

In view of its strong support in the last election and its past record of doing more or less what it likes, the Robarts government cannot be counted on in this instance to act in the best interests of the universities.

Until all these questions are answered, the position of the Ontario universities with reference to the external force of government is an unknown factor.

It is to be hoped the universities do not suffer by what is decided.

Comments on UJA 'White Book'

Jew raps 'White Book'

(The Varsity Wednesday spoke of "disguised extortion" in connection with the campaign methods of the United Jewish Appeal. In this article, written especially for The Varsity, Clayton Ruby (1 Law), former editor of the York University newspaper, gives his "opinions of the UJA and the controversial "White Book.")

By CLAYTON C. RUBY

I swear we have all gone insane. And I, personally, find it very hard to live in this peculiar world.

For example, if I want a book to read, I must be very careful. That object on the shelf of the book-store may look like a book, feel like a book, and it may even contain words. Everybody calls it a book. I'm assured that if I carry it about everyone will think I read books.

But it doesn't say anything. So how can we call it a book? Unless the word "book" has lost all meaning . . . ?

Now if we call this item a non-book, then the United Jewish Appeal (sic!) is certainly a non-charity. It is not even an appeal, for God's sake! It looks like a charity, its public pronouncements sound like a charity, and in distributing money it even acts like a charity.

But its methods negate its function; these methods and this end cannot co-exist in anything we can meaningfully call a charity. It is a non-charity.

What can we say about a community that finds no contradiction between charity and coercion? That approves of ethical fraud?

I'm frankly certain that no one remembers anymore, but the original Hebrew meaning of "charity" happens to be "righteousness". And I'm also certain that no one cares. Any more.

Our "righteous" fund-raisers have, it seems, begun with the reasonable supposition that man has a social duty to act charitably; and then they deduce from this a "right" on their part to use (exploit) social pressure to "enforce" this duty.

Hence, the White Book of the UJA.

Bless their rotten little souls.

The best thing that can be said of the methods of the UJA is that they work. They are probably the most effective means of obtaining great sums of money.

But is this enough to justify them?

Is this enough to justify my act of giving?

Or must I consider the motives from which I give? And if this motive is simply concern for my status in a particular gilded ghetto, shall I then feel proud?

"Are you crazy? Don't you know that there are Jews starving in Israel? Who do you think is going to help them if we don't? The goyim? Your friends on The Varsity, who are so outraged because a few Jews take care of their own?"

"Listen, you should let them mind their own business. If these methods offend their tender little Christian souls, let them worry about the United Appeal. Yeah, the United Appeal. You think I like to have those damn little envelopes put on my desk, with everybody looking to see whether or not I give? What's the difference between what they do and what we do?"

"And I don't know what you're complaining about. Who cares if we put the screws on a few cheap bastards who—you'll have to admit—wouldn't give us a cent otherwise."

I care.

I am just as concerned with the harm that is done to the giver as I am with the benefit to the recipient.

When we institutionalize shallowness, and coercion, and imply that social status is a worthwhile motive for "charity", we do a great deal of harm to ourselves.

I find it degrading.

The White Book of the United Jewish Appeal puts a price on my humanity; and this practice reveals more about my community than I can view with an easy conscience.

Hillel answers back

In the following article, originally submitted to The Varsity as a letter to the editor, Donald R. Schwartz, President of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation, U of T, answers criticisms of the United Jewish Appeal made in an editorial in Wednesday's Varsity

By DONALD SCHWARTZ

As a Jew and as a member of our society I often find it difficult to reconcile my actions with my principles. Obviously I am not the only one of my religion to face this dilemma, nor is this problem peculiar to us alone. The young student who withdrew his article on the United Jewish Appeal is facing this dilemma. Unfortunately he did not realize the implications for others of his public expression of discontent. As you state in your editorial (Jan. 15) the reasoning behind the pressure for withdrawal of the article was that "in the controversy the article was sure to arouse, the issues would become confused."

Your editorial, "Disguised Extortion", by loosely throwing together a few opinions and value judgements without examining their implications has done precisely what was feared by those who requested withdrawal of the article. For example, you state that if funds for the underprivileged cannot be obtained through private contribution, "then we should probably provide financial aid with public funds." The implication, of course, is that government will meet the costs of any charitable organization which cannot reach its goal. Is this a practical solution? Furthermore will government subsidies, which are in fact a form of forced savings, result in a fulfillment of the moral obligation of the individual which you demand?

Second, your argument that "the general public should refuse to contribute to appeals conducted in such a manner" is completely refuted in your own admission" that this type of abstention does nothing to help the people who need help."

Finally, before writing an editorial which may have a strong effect on people who are indirectly concerned, you should be more certain of your facts. While I, myself, find it hard at times to justify the White Book, it does not list all contributors; there are hundreds of anonymous donations, many of which are very sizable; and there is no list of student contributors.

The Jewish community has a long tradition of supporting its own indigent. In order to do so it must collect funds not only in competition with other charitable organizations but also with modern advertising which puts constant pressure on the individual. Granted the methods are not always as we would wish them to be. However, given the situation, a realistic approach to the collection and distribution of social capital is necessary. Unless criticism is well thought out and a constructive alternative is expounded at the same time, the only ones to be hurt by such statements as the unprinted article and your editorial are those who at present benefit from the selfless endeavors of those who participate in these campaigns.

Teen-age Hamlet sulks at Crest

By ERIC RUMP

Perhaps it was Richard Monette's extreme youth that forced the co-director's, Jean Robert's and Marigold Charlesworth into producing the Crest's Hamlet as though it were a domestic tragedy—the sort of thing that could happen to any nice family living a couple of blocks down the street. Monette in actual life is nineteen; on stage he looked if anything younger, with his broad, clean face in striking contrast to his grey-bearded elders. He had, we gathered, some sort of problem about life which upset him, but a problem he could not grasp or understand; he could only give vent to it in passionate outbursts, or in sulky soliloquies. "To be or not to be" was not for him a genuine question (as it was for Gielgud's Hamlet) but more a cosy deathwish, a way in which he could get the attention of his mother and new step-father.

He had probably not done very well at school—indeed may have failed his year at Wittenburg—and his affair with Ophelia, the girl next door, is not going well. There is no suggestion in this Hamlet of any sharpness of intellect or readiness of wit; nor of any inner emotional life which he keeps even from his friends. Everything he has he shows with childlike frankness.

Part of his trouble is his parents. His mother, Gert-rude, (Barbara Chilcott) is a slow, doltish peasant who takes little interest in her son. She has been worn out, before the play opens, with doing the dishes and shopping at the supermarket, and cooking all those bake-meats for her second wedding. Any emotions she has left she spends on her husband; her son she barely notices. Consequently, when he confronts her in the upstairs bedroom, all she can do is weep and wail and agree that she has been a bad mother and an incestuous wife.

Since Hamlet is only a kid, it is unnecessary to build Claudius up into his "mighty opposite". At least this got Claudius out of the melodramatic villain act, lascivious, tyrannical and evil. But it left him as a rather small and worried businessman, a younger Willy Loman, who had made a bad slip somewhere along the line which he was going to regret. It is true he wore a crown throughout most of the play; but it was a paper crown, the sort of crown that comes out

'It's just a bunch of bells,' says U of T carillonneur of his unique instrument

By MARCI McDONALD

A general complaint among carillonneurs is that no one today knows what a carillon is.

But Leland Richardson, carillonneur to the University of Toronto since 1930, has developed a sure-fire formula for enlightenment.

"It's just a bunch of bells," he explains.

And with the dawn of awareness apparent on his listener's face, he proceeds to expound on his beloved art, as he terms it—an art which traces its history back to the handbell playing of medieval Europe and which today has become relatively unique.

Our carillon, located in Soldiers' Tower, adjacent to Hart House, is composed of 42 blended bells, cast in bronze and varying in weight from five tons to a few pounds. A keyboard, complete with foot pedals for the heavier bells, is the modus operandi, summoning the particular note and five distinct tones possessed by each bell.

Mr. Richardson is impatient with those who stress the great physical effort involved in playing the monstrous bells, which depend entirely on his arm and leg muscles, unaided by electricity.

He admits that climbing the steps to the tower may be a physical feat in itself, especially for the father of three man-sized sons. "But if I'm exhausted at the end of a performance," he insists, "it's from emotional expense, rather than physical effort."

His occasions for exhaustion are many, however. He plays at all principal university functions—convocations, alumni homecomings, Remembrance Day services, Christmas parties, New Year's, eves, and the like.

During the summer months he gives Thursday night concerts for those who like to drive or stroll through the campus at dusk. On the remaining six days of a summer week, he gives two daily concerts on the Rainbow Tower carillon in Niagara Falls, where, as he says, he is in competition with the waterfalls.

All this is additional to pursuing his day-to-day business as a general insurance agent. "It's a question of the tail shaking the dog," he says, "but now the whole body is getting pretty well shaken up."

As far as his accomplishments are concerned, he is noticeably vague. Yes, he admits, he was carillonneur for Metropolitan United Church. Yes, he did study under the famous Jef Denyn, at the Mechelen National Carillon School in Malines, Belgium. Yes, he has played every carillon in Canada, and has given concerts throughout the United States and Europe, as well as over radio and television. Yes, he has performed before British Royalty on each occasion that they visited Toronto. Gradually it all comes out.

He is equally vague about his past. "I've been playing around with bells all my life," he says. "It all began with rining the handbell in grade school."

As reticent as he is about himself, so he becomes dynamic and eloquent when speaking of carillons.

"Anyone who can type-write or play the piano can play one," he says, "but the real art is involved in expression and interpretation. An emotional explosion of sound and expression," he describes his playing.

He uses no music, but summons from his repertoire numbers to suit the occasion—anything from a simpler classical piece to a Broadway showtune. And he can't recall having ever used the practice keyboard in the tower.

In the midst of all this spontaneous enthusiasm for his avocation—become-art, there is one objection. The New Year's eve concert puts a hole in his social life.

Community leans on university; the need for teachers grows

Dr. Ernest Sirluck, Professor of English and Associate Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, discusses the advantages of a career in university teaching in an extract from an address given Oct. 8 at a dinner honoring first class students of 1963.

By ERNEST SIRLUCK

The University is not set apart from the community any more. Indeed, it now finds itself not very far from the centre of the community. Perhaps it ought to ask itself a little more insistently than it does whether this new centrality, or at least togetherness, is due wholly to a change in the community, or in part to a change in itself. But I leave that question to another occasion, and content myself with emphasizing the fact that the community now turns to the university for a variety and a range of services which are quite unprecedented. Government, the military, industry, and commerce, now look to the university as the natural place in which their problems can be analysed and solved. And in this they are a good deal like the general public, which has increasingly accepted as axiomatic that it needs more education to cope with the world of today and especially of tomorrow.

Perhaps the public is not quite clear what it means by education or coping, but it sees with the greatest clarity that the day of unskilled and semi-skilled mass labour is drawing to an end, and that even technological skills cannot be relied upon very much longer, since the techniques which they equip one to deal with obsolesce and disappear daily. It has therefore come flocking into the university, and is sending its sons and daughters there, in numbers for which history offers no parallel. Perhaps when it gets to the university it is a little disappointed. Perhaps it expected some magic formula for dealing with the menace of the machine. Perhaps that is in part the reason for the disturbing rate of drop-out in universities all over the world. But those that didn't expect magic, or rather who expected a different and truer kind of magic, and could stay, are here, and keep coming, in such numbers that they present us with a real crisis.

In Ontario just before the war there were 11,000 full-time students in five universities. Last year there were about 35,000 undergraduates and about 4,000 graduate students in eleven universities — a three-and-a-half-fold expansion in a little over twenty years. By the end of the present decade these numbers will have approximately trebled again, in fifteen colleges and universities!

All across Canada the picture in roughly the same.

This crisis of numbers has many difficult aspects: instructional and residential accommodation, library resources and facilities, laboratories, finance, and many others. But you might solve all these in vain if you failed at the most crucial and difficult point, the supply of university teachers. It takes no great insight to see what will happen to the universchange, forgetting what an open mind is like, preferring the past to the present, and averting one's eye from the future. You cannot lose touch with change while you are in part responsible for guiding it; you cannot devote yourself entirely to the past with the future across the lectern from you importuning to be shaped.

The academic life is the freest and most independent life I know. It is free despite the fact that you serve many masters. You serve your subject, you serve your students, you serve your university, you serve society. But you serve no man, and there is no great harm in telling your dean or your department chairman where to get off. He expects it; it's happened to him before and will again. If the wounds he receives of this kind are too deep, he can always escape from the servitude of deaning or chairing and get back to the freedom and independence of undiluted, undivided scholarship and teaching.

ities, and to the education they provide, if instructors have to deal with twice as many students as they have now.

My hope is that reflection upon the advantages of the academic profession will increase the number who choose the academic life.

What are these advantages? They are many, and they vary with the discipline; I will mention only a few of those which I believe to be common to all disciplines.

To begin with, you are assured of making a positive contribution to society. The academic profession is not the only profession of which this is true, but here the assurance is as large as the crisis is acute, and the contribution is always positive, which cannot be said of some other professions.

Secondly, unless you fail yourself, you will have a goal; and this is certainly not something which every profession can claim to give. Indeed, you will have two goals, miraculously linked and parallel. Every major discipline has, in recent years, made great advances in knowledge, and when you commit yourself to a discipline you will find that the pursuit of further knowledge has, almost unawares, become your goal. Shortly thereafter you will feel in yourself a growing need to infect others with this lust for knowledge, and thus your duty to educate the young will hold hands and march in even pace with your passion to know.

And this duty to educate the young will confer yet another benefit upon you. It cannot stop you from growing old, but it can keep you relatively young while you're doing it. Growing old usually means losing touch with

It's the most exciting life I know. When you first get drawn into an academic subject it all seems fixed, immovable, and remote. By the time you've mastered some special aspect of it, you realize that it is changing, alive, at hand. When you have yourself made some changes in it, when those distant Olympians whom you used to read with such awe quote you, and argue with you or defer to you, you are convinced that no tonic was ever so heady. Just wait until the first good book by a student of yours is published and you'll know a header.

Finally, it's the safest life I know. This is not because of job security, or pensions, or feather-bedding — in all these ways many other professions are safer — but because its basic assumptions and equipment do not change. The academic world assumes that knowledge is a good in itself, that the pursuit, advancement, and dissemination of knowledge are goods in themselves, and that the education which results from these activities is a good in itself. It is not indifferent to the use that is sometimes made of this knowledge, but it cannot play God. In a world of changing and disappearing values, it is something to be guided by one which does not change. Nor does the equipment change or grow obsolete. We may come to use all kinds of yet unknown aids to teaching and research, but the basic equipment — the mind — will not change.

SCIENCE

By K. C. McNeill
Professor of Physics,
University of Toronto

Canada was the second country in the world to have a nuclear reactor; the first country to have a "tandem" particle accelerator; the country now chosen to be the centre for the International Geophysical Union; the second country in which helium was liquefied.

These facts show that in these and many other fields of physics Canada has been, if not the premier land of research, at least well up with the leaders. Yet in one huge field, that of elementary particle physics, or high energy physics, Canada's contribution is negligible.

Elementary particle physics emerged from nuclear physics but is now a subject in its own right. It may be defined as physics using for tools, particles of energy greater than 300 million electron volts, but it is more meaningful to show what it does.

Atomic physics deals with the phenomena which we picture as being due to the electrons outside the nucleus of an atom; nuclear physics deals with interactions of nuclei with each other; high energy physics is concerned with finding out about the sub-nuclear particles, those particles which in a sense must be responsible for holding together the protons and the neutrons in a nucleus. And as nuclear physics is intriguing because it is dealing with the "thing" at the very core of our existence, by the same token all scientists are excited to know about the mesons and hyperons, which are in some way connected with nuclear forces.

The names mesons and hyperons, incidentally, are merely indicative of the fact that some of the elementary particles are middle, mezzoo, in mass, intermediate between the mass of an electron, and the mass of a proton, and that some of them, the hyper-ones, are bigger.

The actual manner in which these particles play a part in nuclear forces is not clearly understood, but an analogy may be helpful. It is well known, that in the case of two electrical charges, there is a force between the charges. But how does one charge know that the other charge is near? This raises the old philosophical question about action at a distance. A way out is to take the view that electric charges are continually emitting and absorbing photons, or particles, quanta, of light — if a charge is near other electric charges it will be receiving lots of photons from them, and by this means will "know" that the other charges are nearby. Photons can then be thought of as the messengers of the electric field, or carriers of the electrical information. In a similar way, we can think of mesons as the carriers of the nuclear information, being continually exchanged between protons and neutrons. They are the quanta of the nuclear field.

Twenty five years ago the discovery of a meson was hailed as a great step forward in our knowledge of the forces of the universe. This is still true, even though later research has shown that what was seen was but a bright spot in a still cloudy overall picture. Once physicists were able to produce mesons artificially, it was found that many interconnected forms of mesons exist. What does this mean? That the nuclear force is very complex, and that to each part there obtains an appropriate meson? Or that all the apparently different mesons are just separate manifestations, simply excited states, to use a jargon term, of one or two elementary forms? Or that in fact these two questions are just different ways of saying the same thing? We really should know more about the fundamental forces that hold matter together.

High energy physics is also concerned with what the individual parts of the nucleus of an atom look like. The expression "look like" may seem odd when you consider that you can't even see an atom, never mind a nucleus, but what physicists do is just an extension of our normal meaning, rather than a radical departure from it. Many things we can see with our naked eyes — for smaller things we use microscopes.

Ordinary microscopes are limited however in their capabilities. They cannot be used to look at objects smaller than the wave-length of the light used to illuminate the object, that is, smaller than about a ten-thousandth of an inch.

To give better resolution, electron microscopes can be used, and those currently in use in for example the Princess Margaret Hospital here, can get down to almost atomic dimensions.

Once again, it is reasonable to ask why one should want to do this. And once again it's possible to answer this by referring to a standard philosophical question that has been asked down the ages — what happens to matter if one goes on halving a chunk of it — do you finally find that it can't be done?

As we look inside, do we see that there is a indivisible blob of charge? Or that the charge can be peeled away, like layers of an onion? Or that the laws of physics as we know them now don't work at such small distances?

As I indicated at the beginning, Canada is not taking any active part in solving these questions. Why not? — after all, we should like answers to these fundamental questions. The problems posed are not trivial. One major problem is that the cost of this type of research is not trivial, either. A hospital electron microscope is 3 feet long and costs $30,000. A 40,000 million electron volt accelerator now being built at Stanford, California, will be 2 miles long and will cost $114 million. A moderate high energy programme for Canada would cost 3 to 5 million dollars a year. It is probably this which has scared financiers of research from supporting a high energy project in Canada.

Certainly $3 million a year is not an expenditure to be lightly undertaken, but equally it is not so astronomical that it is to be dismissed without consideration. To put the matter in some perspective, the U.S. manned orbital flights cost each person in the U.S. something over 2 dollars and sat fairly lightly on the economy — the moon project would cost $200 per head and is causing serious misgivings. $3 million a year in Canada amounts to about 20 cents a head per year.

Money spent on space research is not all wasted even if nothing new is learned about space, for technical knowledge and experience in many fields is an important and valuable byproduct. In the case of high energy research, even more of any money spent would be of direct benefit in stimulating valuable industries which have in Canada presently a somewhat borderline economy — for example, the electronics industry which outside the radio and TV field has a very shaky home market. Chalk River has shown that, despite its inaccessible location, a Canadian research laboratory can serve as the springboard for the nuclear power industry.

A second centre, more strategically placed, would provide a rich pool of knowledge and serve as the source of ideas for other sectors of industry. The Toronto-Hamilton area near the Erindale University campus and the Ontario Research Foundation industrial campus seems ideal. Such desiderata would, however, be only peripheral to the main object, to build in Canada another high quality research centre which would serve the advancement of knowledge in a very fundamental area.

Priest unchained

Emmett McLoughlin: Crime and Immorality in the Catholic Church (Lyle Stuart — $4.95).

This former priest blames the Roman Catholic religion for turning Christ's house of prayer into a den of thieves.

Among charges in this sweeping indictment of the Roman Catholic clergy:

There is "wide immorality" among Roman Catholic clerics today;

Roman Catholic teachings encourage crime by distinguishing between 'venial' and 'mortal' sin;

Roman Catholicism's stand on sexuality drives normal people into neurosis at best and suicide at worst.

This is a shocking and controversial book. And because of its content it has beaten down what McLoughlin terms Catholic press control to become a "silent best-seller" without benefit of reviews.

The title was ill-chosen. It suggests a compendium of spicy stories about local priests caught in flagrant delicto with their housekeepers.

Actually, the book contains a carefully-thought-out examination of the essence of Roman Catholic teachings. McLaughlin then produces massive statistics to support his claim that the influence of the Roman Catholic Church on civilization "has been far more evil than good."

After 15 years as a Roman Catholic priest and a subsequent 13 years of study, mostly involving Catholic schools, McLoughlin says:

"Intellectually, the Church of Rome has done its best to strangle the human mind and stifle mental initiative. It must do this if it is to survive.

"No thinking, intelligent, historically studious person... can become or remain a Roman Catholic."

Roman Catholic schools "by threats of sin and false propaganda as to the quality of the education" manage to keep most Catholic children under wraps and teach them "to read and write, so that technically they are literate, but anesthetize their minds so that the result is like an engine running with its gears not meshed."

McLaughlin says venial sin is the primrose path to crime. Venial sin is "appealing" because only mortal sin can plummet the soul immediately and irrevocably into Hell.

Mortal sins include murder, sacrilege, serious drunkenness, idolatry and (paraphrasing) every sin concerning sex, whether in thought, word or deed.

But venial sins — which include manslaughter, lying and income tax evasion — often need not even be confessed. They can be wiped off the soul by a prayer called "the perfect act of contrition."

"The Church's labelling of an act as merely a venial sin is in reality an encouragement to Catholics to commit it," says McLoughlin.

"Since it eliminates the threat of hell-fire from these acts and offers no other effective deterrent, it is completely understandable that this dishonesty and petty lawlessness should be so common among Catholics."

McLaughlin also charges that the Roman Catholic church encourages crime by its teaching of the concept of "penal crime" in which, essentially, a person is not bound in his conscience to obey a law, but is only bound to take his punishment if he is caught.

McLaughlin finds in the Roman Catholic church's stand on sex the most absurd and disastrous facet of Roman Catholic religion.

"The Church's attitude and teaching about sex, the constant over-emphasis on its sinfulness, the attempted suppression of normal sexual urges and desires through the unnatural enforced celibacy of the clergy and their natural consequent perpetual preoccupation with the subject in the pulpit, in the confessional and their own lives — these are the forces that bring about distorted views, clandestine indulgences and neuroses that contribute mightily to immorality and crime."

Father H. Jones in Moral Theology says all directly voluntary sexual pleasure is mortal sin outside matrimony. That would include looks, touches, kisses, jokes, songs and thoughts. Fr. Jones constantly refers to the genital organs as 'incident' parts of the human body.

Meanwhile, charges McLoughlin, priests all over the United States are basely crossing state lines with 17-year-old girls in their cars; seducing women in confessional boxes; indulging in every known sexual perversion; and, at best, being discreet with their housekeepers.

McLaughlin says the Church is aware of the temptations that may bother priests. So a woman living in a rectory as a housekeeper must be "superadulta" — beyond adulthood.

"But the clergy of America interpret 'superadulta' to mean 24 years of age! That the proximity of the flesh between a healthy, frustrated priest and a beautiful woman of that age, living together, should prove irresistible is self-evident." McLoughlin documents many examples of immorality made pastor of a new parish."

That doesn't even shock McLoughlin. The only incident that seemed to jolt him a bit was finding that:

"American gangsterism during Prohibition days was largely a Roman Catholic monopoly," that "some priests in the Chicago area were actually members of Al Capone's gang," and that "the Church's universal neglect of insistence upon the observance of civil law as a spiritual obligation has its extreme fruition in the lawless attitude of the members of the Mafia."

But the peccadilloes of priests are glossed over, and brainwashed members of the Roman Catholic Church are driven to mental illness, McLoughlin feels, by the stern sexual mores backed up by the apparently celibate priesthood.

The most important ritual for the control and rehabilitation of the behavior of Roman Catholics, says McLoughlin, is Confession which he terms "the first step in mental enslavement."

Confession is a "man-made fraud and superstition," he says. Private confession was not required in the early Church.

But now "constant nagging in the confessional" produces neurotics, says McLoughlin, and he gives this dramatic account of the kind of person he used to hear in the confession box—a man who was so scrupulous that priests dreaded having to hear him confess:

"Bless me Father, for I have sinned. My last confession was two days ago—since then I have committed many mortal sins of thought. I had such thoughts walking down the street seeing women and thinking how beautiful their bodies were. I tried to stop such thoughts by prayer and saying 'Jesus, Mary and Joseph' as fast as I could, but the more I prayed the more I saw the pretty women.

"And when I went home and to the bathroom, I thought of the indecent parts of my own body and sinned again.

"Now in confessing these sins I am thinking of them again, and therefore sinning some more. I have just committed all of these sins over again by thinking of them while I am confessing them."

And this frenzy increases as the wretched "sinner" whispers faster and faster, trying to unburden his sins before his mind catches up to them.

McLaughlin remarks wryly:

"Some go to psychiatrists and become normally adjusted. In others, the pendulum swings to the opposite and all moral restraints are dropped."

He mentions one woman who could not live with the Catholic moral code—then decided to resist temptation by giving her eyes to an Eye Bank while she was still alive.

The jacket blurb on this book — McLoughlin's third — says: "Here is a book that will be denounced, an author who will be vilified." No, that's wrong.

Just as only two newspapers took courage to review his first best-seller before it sold more than 250,000 copies, this book will be ignored too. The Roman Catholic Church's greatest strength is in its control of knowledge and public opinion says McLoughlin.

"Behind a benign, philanthropic facade is poised the stinging whip of Catholic censorship over all American means of communication—the press, books, motion pictures, radio and television. It reinforces this bastion of favorable presentation of itself with its own press, both diocesan and national, carrying its side of all questions into millions of homes."

While Buddhists burn and presidents are buried, the Catholic press cautions against the evils of hot baths and sleeping on your back.

And it decides significant questions of mankind such as:

"Does a person break the eucharistic fast by eating ice shortly before Holy Communion?"

MUSIC

By PAUL ENNIS

"Please note that the telecast of the Camera Canada presentation of THE SHORT SWEET SUMMER, the story of the National Youth Orchestra's tour of Canada, has been postponed. The CBC notice sent to you approximately 10 days ago announcing the January 15 playdate on Chane! 6 no longer applies."

— CBC Information Services

For six weeks of last year's summer ninety-two youths played music. Kodaly, Weber, Kabalevsky, Holst, Brahms, Harry Somers, Shostakovich, and more. They played in Stratford, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Victoria, Calgary, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Toronto. It was the fifth session of the National Youth Orchestra of Canada. Founded in 1960 by Walter Susskind after the success of his similar venture in Great Britain, the NYO in 1963 experienced its most productive and most triumphant session to date.

Its stated aim is "to teach talented young musicians to play in a symphony under professional conditions, to assure a constant supply of first-class musicians and to improve the standard of our symphony orchestras." Less specifically it teaches the joy of orchestral playing; it imparts some understanding of the life of a professional musician it stimulates an interest in music not only in the NYO members but in the audiences who hear them.

If it doesn't become spoiled by too lavish praise or isn't exploited by too exuberant a management, the NYO has the potential to be a dynamic force in the Canadian musical future. It should rate the CBC program it may still get.

The actual experience of the four weeks in Toronto and two weeks on the western tour might be difficult to capture on film. When you're lucky enough to be a part of such an experience it stays with you a long time. Essex Ribald was there, publishing in the Hornepayne (Ont.) Quarterly. Some six-month old impressions follow. There's no snow.

"... The past week has been hectic, enjoyable, illuminating, hot, short, and never dull.

"... There is no disputing, however, the impact of the brass chorale at the end, which suddenly, stoically, blares forth, out of what had been a brilliant driving coda, and then falls back into the final bars, when no audience, no orchestra, can resist.

"... This has been a summer of superlatives, an experience to cherish. A very special kinship has grown up among the orchestra members, a bond built from living together for six weeks, travelling for two. From rehearsing, practising, performing music.

"... The unique quality Tuesday night was the special awareness we had of the music, and with it the ability of Mr. Susskind to move the whole orchestra with him, to nurse each phrase and get so much out of the players. It is a rare gift he has, this ability to extract new things from the orchestra after over five weeks of study. He accomplishes this partly because the desire to discover and to give oneself completely to the music is a basic characteristic of this orchestra, and also because he is able to alter his beat, to urge more, with his arms and body, to change radically many of his previous podium mannerisms so that the orchestra responds readily.

"... It is possible to love the music so much, that you rise and fall increasingly with each successive climax, until the end when you're bathed in perspiration, you reach a sort of nirvana.

"... Mr. Vickers later remarked that "this afternoon has been one of those very rare days when I've felt an extraordinary joy and happiness in my music."

"... The Civic Auditorium, Winnipeg, is a huge box with a sprawling balcony and no air conditioning. An almost capacity audience of more than 3,000 attended the concert. In fact, one stage hand could remember only two other attractions which did as well — the Limelighters and J. G. Diefenbaker.

"... The atmosphere here was so much governed by the music that time seemed unimportant, and modern civilization a non-sequitur. In short, we've been in a stimulating musical monastery for most of this month and I don't don't know, about what's coming. In a very special way I'm sorry to be leaving here. The west may change my mind.

"... In rehearsal his beat is steady and clear, his ear perfect and his cues uncanny. He is able to convey physically and verbally the exact idea of how the music should be played... (There is a rapport, an almost mystic fascination which exists, owing more to the youth of the musicians than anything else).

"... The press gave us a too outstanding reception, but we all bought papers anyway.

"... At the concert's end, the audience (of 1400) stood up and cheered. And we smiled and acknowledged the applause and fell into the delirium of staning and sitting as Maestro Susskind entered and exited. And we clapped for him. More encores. Maybe some of us were embarrassed by the 'Bravos' but the lights went on and it was over."

Warm emotion, Cold intellectualism: Picasso has it all

By PAUL RUSSELL

The "Picasso and Man" exhibition is a triumphant success for the Art Gallery of Toronto. It is a retrospective show including paintings done when Picasso was a 17 year old student in Barcelona. Other works are so recent that they are only now out of the artist's studio.

The exhibition, as the title says, deals with Picasso's paintings of man, his concepts of man, subjective, objective, emotional and intellectual. These contrasting qualities are found in all his works in varying degrees. Picasso can be intensely personal and emotional (Woman with Dog) or coldly intellectual (Cubist works); lyrical and classical (Vollard Suite), or compelling and human on the grand scale (Guernica).

'Les Femmes d'Alger' (O.J. version O), executed in 1907, eventually led to the intellectual studies in cubism of both Picasso and Braque. The painting represents five prostitutes — Avignon being the name of a notorious street in Barcelona. It is a large painting (eight feet square) full of complex, angular, harsh movements, coldly staring faces, and Death masks. Sir Kenneth Clarke in his book, "The Nude", wrote 'Les Femmes d'Alger' is the triumph of hate." It is surely one of Picasso's most powerful paintings and is really the only major work in the exhibition.

A fascinating aspect of the Exhibition is a gallery of 61 studies for 'Guernica'. This compelling artistic comment on the tragedy of war was painted by Picasso in 1937 after the bombing of the Spanish town of that name during the Civil War.

The final painting itself was too large (eight feet square) for this exhibition but the studies on view are perhaps even more interesting. The horse's tortured scream, the despair of the mother crawling with her dead child are masterpieces in their own right, apart from the final composition. These sketches give some idea of the thought and patience which went into the later canvas. Also they show the varying stages of refinement from Picasso's original imaginative conception to the finished painting. In the depiction of the horror and tragedy of war, 'Guernica' is unmatched in the history of art. Its scream of desperation is almost audible.

The great contrast to Guernica is the Vollard Suite of etchings executed between 1933 and 1934. This series of 100 plates is light, lyrical, and classically sensual in the tradition of Ingres and Raphael. These prints are by far the most popular of Picasso's works. They portray the relationship between the artist and his model, the brute and the graceful female. Some times the artist is represented as a Minotaur to further convey the same basic qualities of man. The general feeling of all these prints is classical: they are nude figure compositions emphasizing classic simplicity. But often Picasso will jar the spectator with a representation of modern sculpture which in its harsh surrealism clashes with the graceful simple lines of the figures. The National Gallery in Ottawa was the major contributor to this section of the exhibition as it now owns a complete set of 100 prints from the Vollard Suite.

A word should be said about Picasso's portraits of his mistresses which take up several rooms in the gallery. These are intensely personal paintings, in each case reflecting the emotional attitude of Picasso towards his companion. In fact they are really not figurative portraits at all but representations of sheer emotion. "Woman with a Dog" is a good example. It was painted in 1953 when his mistress Jacqueline left him. If in accordance with his earlier substitution of minotaur for artist, we substitute Picasso for the dog, we have some idea of his feelings. The tender expression on the woman's face and the yelping figure of the dog are, both as representations and as abstractions, charged with emotion. The agitation, confusion, and almost claustrophobic qualities of the work are inherent in the colour and composition and would be read as such by the spectator even if the figures of dog and woman were unrecognizable.

These have been comments on works which I found of interest. Generally speaking, in art, this is a matter of personal taste. Perhaps this is never more true than with Picasso. More than any other artists of his calibre, he demands a subjective response from the spectator.

So when you see the exhibition, forget about any preconceived notions you might have read. When you see 'Picasso and Man', as the saying goes, 'relax and enjoy it'.

Woman with a Dog — a study in human anxiety painted when Francoise left the artist in 1953.

Tales from the Quarter

By LARRY GARBER

The person talking in this tale is Valentine. She is medium height, dark straight hair, large in the hip, incommunicable. I often see her with her whore Dee in the Cafe Monaco, large hands pressed to her forehead and her eyes narrow. At midnight, she is at the Cafe Bucy or on the St. Germaine, and at two or three in the morning she is at the Cafe Tournon for the late crowds. Dee never leaves her side. In her tale, Valentine mentions Gottliebs. Gottliebs are pin ball machines; they are in all the cafes in Paris and are manufactured by Gottlieb and company of Chicago Illinois.

I took Dee up to the man about one o'clock and waited myself by the first floor landing. There was no light, I wish there had been a light. Outside there was a slight drizzle. The streets were damp, but the moon was large. I did not take off my gloves for it was chilly; I had a checkered black scarf wrapped around my neck, but the tail of it was wet and I felt it wet against my throat.

At one-thirty I came back up the stairs for Dee. The door was closed but the light was on, I could see it under the door. "Dee?" The man came to the door and let me in. Dee was wiping herself with a green towel. The man was naked. I sat down. The single bulb had no shade and was beside the bed on the floor. The bed was low. The man had been taking pictures with a new camera; I saw it on the dresser. I lifted the camera and underneath were six pictures of Dee. "No," I said, "that is not included." The man shrugged his shoulders. He scrubbed his body with a hair brush. "That will be fifteen francs extra." The man took the pictures over to the light. He made two piles, four in one, two in the other. "It is fifteen francs either way," I said, "for one or all." He put the pictures into a drawer and climbed into bed under the sheets. Dee went to a corner sink and emptied the pan of water. "Doesn't she speak?" asked the man. Dee put on her clothes. The man took the money from beneath the pillow and I took it from him. "Not once did she say a word," he said. I took Dee by the arm and we left him.

On the way it was damp and the rain went inside our shoes. "We should have worn boots," I said. We stopped off to have some chocolate on the Boulevard Clichy. Dee took off her cat and with her short hair and little chest she looked very much like a small boy. Her fingers were short and yellow. She had tiny bee lips in the form of a heart. The bar was bright and shiny, I can't tell you how shiny when seen by the rain and the dark night. The chocolate was warm; I watched Dee sipping slowly and getting a little foam on the corners of her mouth. Her little face was pale as chalk and her eyes were not open wide. I gave her the cigarette and went to play the Gottlieb. I smelt the marijuana ash behind me and I soon won a free game and then another. The Gottlieb was orange and purple and it rang as the balbarian dropped through the slot. Dee came up to it and put her hands on the glass.

We walked through the streets and down the small slope from Pigalle. At St. Lazare we went into the metro; Dee and I stood in the metro car. There was a lady sitting there with an accordion and a cup; she had two glass eyes. We got off at Odeon and walked all the way to the Cafe Tournon. That was very brightly lit and the Gottliebs were noisy. Emmanuel the Spanish was playing and swearing; he rocked the Gottlieb with his arms and stomach like a lover. Maurice put us in a table at the back. He had a thick nose. I ordered two omelettes and Dee asked for another cigarette. Jules the Seducer came over to talk, then Corrinne and then Emmanuel the Spanish and Trixy. Emmanuel said that the Gottlieb was upset; if the Gottlieb as good to you then everything is alright, but when the Gottlieb gets angry then you might as well sleep all day. He said he played the Gottlieb every morning for a sign. George told us a joke.

Four or five men were sitting a table away and one of them smiled at Dee. She was wearing trousers with little blue buttons. The omelettes came and I wrote on the napkins in English, "Woman's Voluntary Service," and passed it on down the line of tables. An American came back with the napkin and asked if she were male or female. Dee's eyes were almost closed, like those of a little cat. The smell of the cigarette made me dizzy. "Female," I said. The American was not convinced and bent over to look into her face. He went back to the others and I could hear them talking and deciding not to take her. We ate the omelettes slowly. Maurice came over and joked with us for awhile. Had we heard the latest story about that Idiot Vangrin the writer? He wrote a play yesterday afternoon in the front of the cafe and in the last act the actors had to bring a cow on stage and slaughter it. Everyone told him that was silly, what if it was a successful play, how could you kill a cow every night? So he re-wrote the last act and in the revision all the actors had to do was bring on hunks of fresh meat. Maurice waited for a tip and then joked some more. Did we know that he had given that idiot Vangrin twenty francs because Vangrin had promised to put him in his novel? "Maurice," Vangrin that idiot said, "for ten francs I will mention your name in my novel, for twenty francs you will get to kiss the girl in my novel, and for forty francs I will put you in bed with her on page three hundred and twelve." He is taking money orders now, and when he has enough money he will write the novel and put in all the names who paid for it. "I can't afford to sleep with her," said Maurice, "but I can afford to kiss her on page two hundred; he promised me it will be a long kiss and will last four pages." Dee liked to hear him talk. Her lips were so very tiny and pink. Her ears were tiny too. The darkness and the cold outside made all the sounds louder. Knives and forks clinking against the tables and around us I heard the dull thud of glasses. Dee took me by the sleeve and spoke softly telling me things. Little Dee. She had tiny puffs under her eyes and wore a brown shirt unbuttoned at the throat. Her arms were very nice. She finished the cigarette and dropped it under the table. Cheryl came over and talked. She was worried. Anne the Pregnant waved. Cheryl said goodbye. Lots of time passed. Many people we knew played cards and joked. Homicz blew bubbles in his wine and made his funny monkey sounds. Dee rested her head against the wall. There was no business to-night, but there was nothing to be done about that. I played eight games on the Gottlieb with Emmanuel the Spanish and lost; he said he would wake up the next morning instead of sleeping all the day; he thanked me for this good sign; the Gottlieb loves its own, he said. I played five games with Garber and won.

The glare of the lights in the cafe gave me yellow spots on the wet street and in the dark air. We walked awhile and then walked to our hotel. Across the way the Cafe Bucy was noisy and the light glared. Fitz waved from the corner and his friends watched Dee pass into the hotel doorway looking sick and tired. I came after her and we mounted the stairs in the dark. I could smell the rooms. We climbed the stairs to our room and I put on the small light. Outside I could see the other hotel windows and the shadow of chimneys. Dee undressed and went into the bed. I opened the windows; it was very cold. I could hear Dee groan and whimper. I turned a little gas on from the stove to make us drowsy. I took off my clothes and came into the bed. Dee curled her back into my chest and stomach and lay facing the wall while we waited for sleep.

HAMLET Contd.

of crackers at Christmas, not the crown of Denmark. He could pretend to be a king, without having to face the political problems of a real king; consequently both Fortinbras and the roaring mob in the second half are quietly removed from the text.

The family next door quite often drop around. Polonius (Robert Christie) is a nice, gentle old man, who means well and treats everybody with kindness. This means that the Polonius who is played only for laughs is avoided; but it also means that his self-involvement, his dodderiness, his inability to grasp a situation, are lost as well. To laugh at this Polonius would be in bad taste, like laughing at a cripple. His son, however, is a bright, brisk young fellow (played by Neil Dainard) who should do well but his daughter gets herself into trouble and goes mad. These scenes were the most effective in the play.

Gone was all the white, wishy-washy Lady of Shalott type of Ophelia, who drifts to her watery grave without even letting her ship show. Instead, Jackie Burroughs came stamping onto that stage, dressed like a ragged tart, convinced that she had been defiled, and clutching in her hands a limp, grey doll that looked like a monkey. At times it was her father, at times Hamlet, at times something vile and loathsome, which she would fling disgustingly from her to some far corner of the stage.

Why, with this domestic interpretation of the play, the producers did not choose modern dress and a more homely setting, I do not know. Instead, they gave all the players the customary doublet and hose, and then set them to act out their tragedy in an abandoned construction site. The stage setting was a most curious affair, full of steel girders and little platforms, that rotated on the revolving stage. To this was added liberal doses of cacophonous music — electronic, if you want to be polite — a mixture of excited vacuum cleaners and discordant bells.

The text was treated with a free hand, odd lines disappearing here and there. One of the gravediggers was disposed of, and the remaining one came up with a new solution for how long Yorick's skull has lain in the grave. It has been there thirteen years. The most irritating change was the exclusion of Fortinbras. His absence meant that the possible contrast with Hamlet was lost; and that the idea of some sort of rebirth at the end was excluded, for the play closed on Horatio's lines, "And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest". This shifted the emphasis from the situation as a whole to the one figure, the kid who never made it. Still, since Fortinbras would have only been an unwelcome guest, it was probably better to keep the thing in the family.

Oistrakh great, but...

By PAUL ENNIS

The violin, more than any orchestral instrument, craves the solo repertoire. In the display of tonal contrast or richness of sound it has no competitors. In technical exhibitionism it is surpassed only by the piano. Its musical powers are many, as are its demands on the performer. By his mastery of so many of these demands, David Oistrakh is among the great contemporary violinists.

His is not a really full tone, laden with rubato. It is more pure, silken. He is a master craftsman of technique and his pyrotechnic wizardry enables him to succeed with the violinist-composers such as Locatelli, Vieuxtemps, and Sarasate. His control and delicacy make his chamber music and pre-Romantic solo work great.

The Oistrakh recital at Massey Hall this week showed off his virtuosity and pure tone well but so-so programming and a sometimes too mathematical approach detracted from his performance. It seemed as though the placement of each note was painstakingly analysed beforehand.

This was an asset in the meticulous spacing of notes in the Vitali Chaconne, the controlled transition from phrase to phrase in the slow movement of the Brahms First, the (apparent) effortless ease of the pyrotechnic of the Szymanowski Taranella, and the faultless timing in general.

But he needed to let go more in the opening movement of the Brahms and the slow movement of the Beethoven. And why did he use his warmest sound in the Vitali, thus post-dating it by 175 years?

Of the works programmed only the Brahms is a wholly satisfying piece of music. Icing is fine, and Oistrakh excelled in the Shostakovich-Tsiganov Preludes and Szy-monowski, but the frills seemed an overbalance in the program.

Oistrakh's execution of the steely trills, his controlled bowings, the scale passages of the Beethoven, the character he managed to give to the Preludes, his dazzling harmonics, pizzicati, and bow-bouncing tricks, were matchless. But his dynamic heights seemed too confined, though his phrasing always had the hint of the underlying scale.

This lack of really fiery playing detracts only a little (and here only in heavily Romantic music) from the genuine virtuoso that he is.

Peter, Paul and Mary march past Caesar

BY VOLKMAR RICHTER

It was almost two years ago that a new, relatively unknown folk group billed as Peter, Paul and Mary opened in Toronto at the Colonial Tavern. Critics acknowledged the excellence of the group but paid it no special attention.

So unnoticed were these three young singers that they were able to enter the Bohemian Embassy, sing a few numbers and leave again before the audience realized who they were. Or so the story goes anyway.

Last summer Peter, Paul and Mary appeared as one of the main acts at the Newport Folk Festival and one of them, Peter Yarrow was on the board of directors of the festival.

Their re-entry into Toronto promises to be at least as successful as any triumphal march into Rome taken by the Caesars literally the most important act in folk music today.

Whatever they do, they do honestly, with no false gimmickry. They are a commercial group, yes, but they never lose sight of the fact that their music is the music of the people, expressing hope, desire and often pain in a simple profound manner. P, P & M sing their music in the way it was intended.

They can perform everything from the most inspiring of Spirituals to the tenderest of love ballads.

As an added treat a P.P & M concert contains a considerable amount of comedy provided chiefly by Paul Stookey, who has a great talent for mime. He once earned his living as a stand-up comedian in Greenwich Village.

In the Village, he met Mary Travis a young willowy blond with a clear, emotion-filled voice who once performed folk music and wanted to start again. The two performed as a duo until manager Al Grossman joined them with Peter Yarrow, a Cornell graduate in philosophy and a former lecturer in a folk ballad course.

The resulting trio went in to rehearsal for 7 months, worked up a repertoire of 18 songs and the rest is musical history.

The rush for tickets for their Massey Hall concert (Sunday night was sold out in four days) proves Toronto's recognition of their talents. The concert will certainly be one of the best we'll see this or any year.

Genius with a whip

BY VOLKMAR RICHTER

Bob Dylan is about as unlikely a genius as you'll find anywhere.

The composer of Blowing in the Wind and Don't Think Twice, Bob has caused quite a stir among folk-music fans on both sides of the border. He has been hailed a genius by the critics but doesn't at all resemble the stereotyped image of a genius. He's thin, sports an untidy mop of dark, blonde hair and usually wears a sloppy shirt and an old, faded pair of blue jeans. He reminds you of a juvenile delinquent and you'd expect to see him roaming down one of our city's back alleys with a chain in his hand.

In fact, he usually carries a long black bull-whip. Periodically he'll leave the crowd he's with, walk to an open area and crack the whip around his head a few times before returning.

After the Sunday night concert at the Newport Folk Festival this year, the usual crowd was waiting at the exits hoping to catch a glimpse of some of the stars. One fellow was particularly anxious to see Dylan and after quite a lengthy wait (after Pete Seeger, Joan Baez, Ed McCurdy and others had all gone by) he started to become very impatient. When I explained to him that Dylan had already passed and described the young artist, the fellow couldn't believe it. "But that guy's too young," he said. "Too young to write those great songs."

That you'll find is the usual first reaction to Dylan (it was mine to when I first met him). He's only 22 and now has more than 200 songs to his credit one of which, Blowing in the Wind recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary, is the fastest-selling single ever put out by Warner Brothers Records. Bob himself has recorded two albums for Columbia — both of which are good sellers. He was playing the guitar at the age of 10 and within the following year he had taught himself to play the mouth-organ and autoharp. Almost every folk-singer in the land has a Dylan song in his repertoire and there's talk of Bob starring in a movie.

It seems that the kid is really getting somewhere.

Born in Duluth, Minn., he now makes his home in New York where he has a huge following among the coffee-house crowd. Here in Canada he is not as well-known but his songs certainly are.

South of the border he commands as much enthusiasm as Seeger, Baez, Bikel and the other folk greats. Bob was one of the best-received performers at Newport.

His songs are simple yet powerful protests although Dylan is quick to state that he is not protesting at all. "My songs are reflections, they're what I think," he told me. Readers may refer to the lyrics of Blowing in the Wind and decide for themselves whether there is any social protest there.

The songs cover almost every subject under the sun from the Second World War to the ring death of boxer Davey Moore. Bob's first song was about Brigitte Bardot.

On first hearing him sing you'll be very surprised. In all likelihood you won't like it — he has a terrible voice — very nasal with a harsh, unusual grating. But after hearing an entire album or seeing one of his performances, you're conditioned. You'll even like his singing although you won't be able to explain why.

Of course, seeing him in person is better than hearing him on record. Dressed in the same untidy clothes I mentioned above, he performs his material in his own unique style. He's not relaxed and lethargic like a Como. In fact, he seems to be forcing the notes out. The meaning of the songs coupled with a powerful delivery have an almost electric effect upon the audience. You can't help but understand the message.

When asked under what conditions he works best, he answered very seriously: "When I'm high with a bit of booze." Patrons of the Bitter End in New York report occasionally seeing him in the basement of that club "preparing" for a performance.

Dylan is a frequent visitor at Negro freedom marches for as he says: "I still think that some of the biggest criminals are those that turn their heads away when they see wrong and know it's wrong."

When Bob sees wrong, he tells others about it in his songs — and they understand him.

Cruel but intimate

By RAY WYLIE

Over the holidays, the Bohemian Embassy has dredged its murky cellars and managed to come up with an interesting trio of short one-act plays. Running until January 18th, the program of "intimate theatre" consists of plays by August Strindberg, Anton Chekhov, and Eugene Ionesco. With these controversial writers at his disposal, director Norman Burns dug up the Embassy's improvised theatre and deposited it gently in the middle of the coffee-house floor, to provide an enjoyable and stimulating evening at Toronto's leading coffee-house theatre.

Strindberg's The Stronger opens the show, and apart from some bad timing the cast is able to set the mood for this delicate psychological battle between two young women. As Mrs. X, the troubled wife, Mary Shebib shows a fine command of her emotions, and convincingly progresses from outward sureness to complete breakdown to genuine self-confidence.

In its complementary psychological interrelation, Strindberg's play presents a challenge to the cast, both Miss Shebib and Nadia Selnick, Miss Y, are quite successful in their roles.

The next offering is Chekhov's The Harmfulness of Tobacco. As the wife-dominated lecturer, Walter Bolton captures both the outward humour and quiet desperation of the little man's struggle to free himself from the choking involvement of a sterile and unsatisfying life. This pathetic figure struggles in vain to escape his reality, but is finally trapped and crushed by the merciless dominance of his wife. By use of effective gesture, Mr. Bolton is able to bring out the qualities of Chekhov's fine monologue, although his voice was perhaps too measured and strained. Nevertheless, it was an enjoyable performance of an excellent piece of writing.

Eugene Ionesco provides the highlight of the evening in The Leader. Ionesco, confronted with the problems of modern mass society, fears the loss of individuality which develops side by side with huge urban centres and more "efficient" mass communication. Depicting a crowd awaiting the arrival of The Leader, the play gives a brilliantly cutting portrayal of the mass hysteria and blind allegiance which can often grip a whole nation.

The crowd waits patiently for the Leader, and follows his every movement with unbridled enthusiasm, while dreading the chance that he may not come. Larry West gives a convincing interpretation of the hysterical announcer, whose step by step commentary is capped by the observation that "the Leader is sucking his thumb." Such details do not, however, quench the crowd's rabid enthusiasm, and upon the Leader's approach they become delirious with emotion. His actual arrival throws them into mass hysteria which is further heightened by the revelation that the Leader "has no head". The play ends when the Leader, having said nothing, walks off with the crowd following, dragging in to the mass a young couple hitherto detached from the general involvement.

The Bohemian Embassy has, I am happy to relate, come up with an interesting evening of good plays well done. In spite of minor flaws, director Norman Burns has managed to capture the essence of each play, and his cast do both him and the authors justice.

Can Batman succeed in his desperate attempt to become heterosexual? Will Robin defeat Kathy Kane?

In the whirling dilemma that is our life on earth today, great philosophers turn increasingly to such questions, along with: "Does the DC-7 eat her young?" and "Which is the left sock?"

After recovering from the shock of paying 12 cents for the latest Batman comic (remember when you only had to save five pop bottles for one?) I conducted my personal investigation of Batman's morals.

Batman and Robin, in real life Bruce Wayne and Dick Grayson of Gotham City, still lead an idyllic life. Bruce is still on the unemployment records as a "socialite" and Dick is Bruce's "ward." We all know what that means.

They while away the hours in a sumptuous home over the Bat Cave. Large vases filled with lovely flowers surround them. Bruce spends much time in his dressing gown.

A homosexual's dream. Sometimes, to emphasize their relationship, they are shown on a couch, Bruce reclining lazily and Dick sitting next to him, partially undressed and with his hand resting on Bruce's arm.

They await the call to battle. Master criminals sighted.

Bruce and Dick glide swiftly into the bedroom; lithely slither out of their clothes; fight, we presume, immediate temptation; and don their "crime fighting togs" to emerge as Batman and Robin — the "daring duo."

Batman is an ox-like creature. Robin is a small, ephebic youngster. His uniform reveals bare, hairless legs.

Criminals often capture Robin, and Batman has to "give in" if he can't save his friend, threatened with death:

Other adventures are more obviously slanted. Here the "dynamic duo" loiters perilously on a giant robot's tongue:

Women rarely appear in Batman stories. Normal readers of Batman — one suspects they are few — get suspicious sometimes and a recent Batman issue dared to print this letter of complaint:

"All right, I give up!!! What's going on? Are you editors all bachelors or just the plain ANTI-FEMALE type?..."

Women that do appear, usually carry whips. A beautiful girl is practically always a villain. The exception is Kathy Kane.

New to the Batman canon, she is Batwoman by night — a sort of female Batman — but it is made plain that she does not know his "identity" — i.e. does not sleep with him.

But this recent addition to the Batman comic world threatens Robin. She has a chance to drive Batman to normalcy.

In the good old days, Batman and Robin, both wearing evening clothes, would prance out for a night's entertainment together. Now Robin has his hands full keeping his old friend among the gay set.

Lately Kathy has been having a tough time. In the only story in which she appears in recent issues, early in the adventure "a sports car pulls to the curb and Bruce (Batman) Wayne hails Kathy (Batwoman) Kane." He doesn't get out of the car, but says:

"Kathy... about our date tonight — I'm afraid I won't be able to make it."

That's all. No excuse. Nice and casual. He speeds home to Robin.

Two noted pianists coming to Hart House

Within a span of five days, Hart House will be host to two of the most electric and promising young pianists in the world — this Sunday, Anton Kuerti, winner of the Leventritt Award (1957), pianist with many of the world's prominent orchestras and a "smoldering talent... a young man born to make music" — the following Thursday British pianist John Ogdon, first-prize winner of the 1962 Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow and "really an astonishing young man... quite a pianistic genius."

These two young but internationally known musicians will present programs of related interest in Great Hall of Hart House. Both include Beethoven in their program: Kuerti plays two complete Beethoven sonatas (Les Adieux and Op. 101) and a Bloch sonata composed in 1935. Ogdon includes shorter compositions of Bach, Brahms, Ravel, and Liszt in his program.

Tickets are available for both concerts free of charge to male undergraduates and their guests. The Kuerti program starts at 9 p.m. (Sunday), the Ogdon concert at 8:20 p.m. (Thursday), and the tickets are at the Hall Porter's desk

Never has so much been spent on so many for gournisht

By DAVID SECTER

What happens when all of Hollywood's unemployed comedians converge onto a cinerama screen? A three-and-a-half hour yawn.

It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World (here after called Madness) was made on the premise that movie-goers can be satisfied with sloppy slapstick and moth-eaten gags. Stanley Kramer fathered the illusion that a bad joke gets funnier when it is repeated a dozen times. Ethel Merman (loud-mouthed mother-in-law-type) hollaring "Shaddup ya stoopid idiot" as she wallops some helpless male over the head with her oversized handbag is not exactly uproarious the first time; it certainly does not get any funnier with repetition.

Watching three cars and a moving van race recklessly along narrow mountain roads has some value as emotional release. It's great for fifteen minutes, maybe half an hour, but the concave screen starts to warp when we have to watch these auto-antics for two solid hours.

Madness is supposed to be an updated, big screen version of The Keystone Cops. But in three hours we would like to see some vestiges of plot, character, or dialogue. The story line is so thin that it is almost imperceptible. Ex-con Jimmy Durante is racing to dig up the $35,000 he hid before his sojourn on the State. He crashes to his doom, but before St. Petering out, he tells four carloads of would-be-good-samaritans that the money is buried under the Big W in the Santa Rosita State Park. Sid Caesar, Milton Berle, Ethel Merman, Mickey Rooney, Buddy Hackett, and Jonathon Winters are variations of the money-grubbing American type. En route to the loot they are joined by Phil Silvers, Terry Thomas, and a plethora of other familiar faces.

If these veteran comics had ad-libbed their lines they could have come up with wittier rapport than they were given in Badness. The closest thing to a yuk-yuk is Terry Thomas remarking on the American male's preoccupation with the bosom: "If American women stopped wearing brassiers, the entire national economy would collapse." Jolly good, ay wot?

Mad World is the greatest waste of talent since Buddy Holly, Ricky Valens, and the Big Bopper went down in a plane crash. Producer Stanley Kramer has given us a meritorious series of movies with a message, among them Judgement at Nuremberg,

The Defiant Ones, and Man With a Golden Arm. If Madness was intended as a comic relief, it fails on both counts. America's most popular comedians vie with one another to see who can turn in the most tepid performance. Only Buddy Hackett and Terry Thomas overcome the formidable odds and provide some mildly amusing vignettes. Spenser Tracy, as a "good cop" who yields to the sweet smell of easy money, is visibly self-conscious for being associated with this film. It is, undoubtedly, the low point of Spenser's distinguished movie career.

Amateur sadists will roar with delight at the methodical destruction of a gas station, hardware store, countless cars and innumerable humans. But there is not the slightest semblance of creativity in all the carnage. As the movie gasped to its demise, I sighed with relief that at least they had not stooped quite as low as the banana peel gag... but sure enough, that was saved for the grand finale. Ethel Merman goes flying into the air in a flurry of bare legs and begirdled hips — at least the fifth time we had the titillating pleasure of seeing her in this array.

The only consolation in this egregious fiasco is the new process of cinerama which uses a single camera instead of three, thus eliminating the fuzzy margins where the screens join.

Madness is effective as a release from the trials and tribulations of university life, but anyone who can endure it for three-and-a-half hours must be thoroughly injured to this mad, bad, sad world of ours.

Doris can't decide whether to sex or not to sex

By ARTHUR ZELDIN

"Move Over Darling" is the latest in the series of "sophisticated comedies" put out by the production firm of Doris Day and husband Martin Melcher. Generally, in this type of film, two fashionable adults are witty and exciting about sex. Sex is a game to be played by both male and female with love and a sense of humour. Think of Gary Grant and Ingrid Bergman in "Indiscreet." Miss Day's pictures in this vein are more specific; the core of each film is the question, "To sex, or not to sex?" The answer invariably being, "Not until marriage, you brute!"

The game has become much more of a war between predator and prey. This is not to say that her films are incapable of demonstrating style and showmanship. Remember "Pillow Talk"? This was a tightly-scripted, fast-moving, clever farce, in which she was ably assisted by Rock Hudson.

But Miss Day's films have always demanded much from their audiences. People are asked to forget that Doris is usually a good decade older than her leading men and that she is at once a mature and appealing woman, and a virgin. They must also forget statistics concerning unwed mothers and pregnant brides. A properly-handled, diverting film can get away with it; people "suspend their disbelief" and consent to be entertained. In droves, too. However, the demands on one's credulity made by Move Over Darling are preposterous. One is asked to believe that a married woman stranded on a desert island with another very attractive man for five years never allows herself to be touched by him. Furthermore, when this incredibly faithful woman is miraculously returned to her husband, she finds that he has just remarried that very same day. He has not had time to consume his new marriage, but will our heroine sleep with her beloved mate before he gets an annulment from his second wife? Not on your life! Is the American woman really such a sexless creature? If so, its no laughing matter.

Anyhow, the remainder of the film concerns Doris's efforts to get her mate to shed wife number two and marry her.

Mind you, she does give a performance of considerable spirit, charm, and even tenderness. And she certainly does not look old enough to be your mother or mine. The wonders of photographing through cheese-cloth! However, James Garner, playing opposite Doris in their second consecutive film together, does not match her in competence. He is alright when he chortles and blushes but that's about the scope of his humour.

Variations on a haunting theme

By TASNEEN A. KHAN

"There is one great novel in the breast of every man." It seems that some of our best directors have no more than one great film. Michelangelo Antonioni's latest film Eclipse seems to add little to his previously stated themes.

When Antonioni's L'Avventura was shown at the Cannes film festival several years ago it was greeted with thunderous applause, prolonged booing and cat-calls. There can however be little doubt that it was masterpiece. Perhaps for the first time a completely cinematic language of expression was fully developed. Antoni relied for expression of feeling; mood, atmosphere, even character, very much on image rather than word. For this purpose he developed a very personal style. His tempo was studiously slow, his images almost like engravings. His cinema therefore moved at the slow, unhurried pace of time itself, and each glance, each seemingly aimless action conveyed the feeling the character was experiencing.

The plot of L'Avventura, it can be called that shows Sandro and Claudia living aimless lives in the aimless atmosphere of Italian high society. Sandro and Anna are having a love affair which has ceased to have any more meaning than the physical. During a pleasure cruise off the coast of Southern Italy, Anna disappears. We never learn what is the face of Anna; Whether she committed suicide, had an accident, or was raped and killed. The rest of the film develops into a beautiful study of Sandro (Gabriele Ferzetti) and Anna's close friend Claudia (Monica Vitti). In the course of their search for Anna, the relationship which develops between them is studied with deep sensitivity by Antonioni.

The lack of explanation as to Anna's fate is typical of Antonioni. He hate typing life up neatly into plots, for life lacks the coherence we demand from it. He has no desire to create order where order is not. His aim is more to study the predicament of the modern man in our cold, acquisitive society, which destroys every feeling, so that we are uncertain how to express ourselves, even in love.

In his two subsequent films La Notte and Eclipse he comes back to the same theme but with diminishing effect. In Eclipse we once again see Monica Vitti as a sensitive girl Vittoria, and Alain Delon as Piero, a young stockbroker who is being brutalised in the ruthless atmosphere of the stock exchange. The modern man and woman seek in each other and themselves that depth of feeling which modern life has destroyed. But often they have to be content with the cheap substitute of physical eroticism. "There are some nights" confesses Vittoria, "when a man is more than a table or a chair or an object."

The slow, deliberate tempo of L'Avventura which once was so delicate and made one think of Antonioni as the Marcel Proust of the Cinema, is too consciously emphasized in his later films and now is beginning to look like affectation. Antonioni has the advantage of having the hauntingly beautiful and delicately expressive face of Monica Vitti in all three of his films. Her sensitive performances are now an integral part of his technique. But one is left with the feeling that Antonioni has said all he had to say and his works now are merely variations on a theme.

The sound of surprise

By DAVID JACKEL

The current jazz scene is one of real chaos. Any number of inexplicable things are going on. Like, Ornette Coleman hasn't made a record for months. And it's now impossible to tell whether you've had one too many when you look at a saxophone player and see three horns or more stuck in his mouth. And the price of beer at the Friars continues to rise. And Phil Mckellar's night program now has more commercials than music. And Patrick Scott actually had good words for Dizzy Gillespie and Thelonious Monk.

It's frightening, that's what it is. But amidst the confusion there's one last outpost of stability, the Colonial, where Buck Clayton and Buddy Tate are currently concluding their third week.

Both of these musicians first made their mark on the jazz world with the old Count Basie band (not to be confused with its latter-day successor) and neither has altered his style to speak of since that time. Clayton's beautiful tone, his lyricism, and his ideas are as impressive as ever, and he continues to obtain a well-deserved critical recognition in a period when most of his "main-stream" contemporaries have fallen by the wayside or been overshadowed by more modern trumpeters. And Tate, whose saxophone style is in the direct line of descent from early Coleman Hawkins, plays on in a manner which is never startling, but is at the same time so exactly right that you wonder why no one has ever thought of doing a particular improvisation that particular way before.

Musicians like these give the older forms of jazz a vitality and a warmth which is lacking in the music of some more modern jazzmen, and prove that originality can overcome the problem of performing worthwhile jazz in the context of a well-explored idiom. Buddy Tate can even give a jazz rendering of Polka Dots and Moonbeams, something even an iconoclast like Roland Kirk might think twice about.

Aiding these two veterans, and anchoring an otherwise average rhythm section, is the big sound of bassist Tommy Potter, whose talents include the most imperturbable of facial expressions. Potter probably wouldn't blink an eyelash at the most earth-shaking of events. Like all the loud non-listeners at the Colonial suddenly observing two minutes' silence in memory of the repeal of prohibition.

A reminder is in order that jazz returns to Hart House this Tuesday at five o'clock. Tony Collacott, who has given two very successful noon-hour concerts, will lead a group of undetermined size through some explorations in the upstairs music room. Rumors (as yet unconfirmed) have Collacott leaving Toronto as the accompanist for Teri Thornton. If rumors are correct, Collacott may be getting the break he deserves and this may be his last Hart House appearance. The Tuesday concert is free, no tickets are required, and women will be welcomed both escorted or otherwise.

Two more five o'clock sessions are planned, and will feature local professionals. Noon-hour jazz will not resume until February.

JAZZ GOES TO CHURCH

Jazz will make an appearance in surroundings far removed from the usual nightclub or coffee-house atmosphere this Sunday evening at St. Luke's United Church, where Toronto will hear its first Jazz Liturgy.

The project is the brainchild of Reverend Gene Young, who is a jazz enthusiast and believes that it is possible to convince church-goers that this music is not incompatible with their religion. Young is an associate minister at a church much involved in community services, and he believes as well that jazz can provide him with a basis for personal contact with people if he can show that it is not necessarily a music associated with Toronto nightlife.

No standard liturgical form will be employed, nor will the presentation be an attempt to exploit the gospel roots of jazz. The narration, written by Young, is a five-part structure dealing with religious themes from the Creation to the Resurrection, and will be alternated with music of appropriate mood. This music will not be written out, but will be genuine jazz with the usual improvised solos.

Ron Rully, one of Toronto's better jazz drummers, leads the sextet which performs the music. And Rully has been associated with the presentation from the beginning, since it was out of conversations with him that the original idea grew. The remainder of the rhythm section also looks very good, and includes Wray Downes on piano, trumpeter Ed Bickert, and bassist Bob Price. Jazz violin and guitarist will make up the front line. Those involved had been willing to donate their time, but the benevolence of the Musician's Union will ensure payment since it is considering this endeavor as something of a benefit.

It is to the credit of Reverend Young and the union (which incidentally is also picking up the tab for the five o'clock concerts at Hart House) that they are willing to undertake this venture. Its artistic success cannot be predicted, but all interested persons are welcome on Sunday evening. Starting time is 7:30.

5

By KEN DRUSHKA

Like motherhood, the welfare of the university is viewed as a good thing by students, faculty and administration.

But how this welfare is to be assured is subject to as many varied opinions as the personalities involved in the academic community. All persons concerned are committed to maintaining the independent position of the university and fending off external pressures. It is in how this goal is to be most effectively achieved that the ideas differ.

When students ask for increased powers over their administrative affairs and a voice in the academic decision-making process they encounter opposition at many levels.

PATERNALISM AND CONSERVATION

In many cases this opposition is regarded as paternalism, in others as conservatism. With the exception of one man, increased student participation in the governing of the university meets with qualified reservations.

The most obvious although misunderstood obstruction to student requests for student autonomy came last year from Administrative Vice-President Frank Stone when the Students' Administrative Council submitted its proposals for constitutional change.

It was explained in an earlier article that Mr. Stone was caught between the SAC and the board of governors, to whom he is responsible.

In conversation and as an administrator, Mr. Stone is somewhat sympathetic to the SAC requests for financial autonomy. But he does not appear to have any understanding of the basic reasons and motivations for the student requests.

When discussing student action in academic matters—which, granted, is not his sphere—Mr. Stone gives the impression that he cannot comprehend why students should even be interested in such affairs.

VICE-PRESIDENT WOODSIDE

This latter approach is in many ways reflected in the statements of the academic vice-president, Dr. Moffatt St. Andrew Woodside.

Dr. Woodside says students should not have participation in the formal governing bodies outside their own immediate area for two reasons: First, because students are only at the university for eight months a year, for three of four years and there is no continuity of student opinion and action.

Secondly, Dr. Woodside says students should not have to bother with the complex problems of governing the university. This is a job best handled by the administration, he says.

A POLITICAL ISSUE

Dr. Woodside is quite certain that university education will become a political issue, a proposition which may offer a danger to the academic communities.

The greatest hope in counteracting this danger lies with the university's graduates who are tending to take a greater interest in university affairs, Dr. Woodside states.

He says undergraduates are also taking an increased interest in academic affairs and that the general undergraduate body today is superior to that of 40 years ago. Today's undergraduate is far more interested in academic affairs than football games, Dr. Woodside claims.

How then do undergraduates make use of and express this increased interest?

Dr. Woodside says they have no difficulty in expressing their opinions. He points out that he now deals with the SAC and provides a direct contact between students and the President.

DISCUSSION NEEDED

The vice-president says there is a great need for informal discussion of university problems on the undergraduate level in order to get the issues clarified and students educated so they will know what they are talking about.

Dr. Woodside is opposed to the idea of a student centre for two reasons. First, because it would be financed by an increased student levy, the board of governors would have to force Today's students to pay for something students in the future would enjoy.

Secondly, with the five new colleges the social centre would be unnecessary. Dr. Woodside is considered the chief proponent of the small college system which the U of T now is in the process of developing.

CONFLICT WITH SMALL COLLEGES

The university — wide student centre would conflict with the functioning of these small college units, Dr. Woodside believes.

These opinions aside, Dr. Woodside is credited with vastly improving the relations between the SAC and the administration. Doug, Ward, SAC president, reports a definite lack of conflicts and says Dr. Woodside is in many ways the SAC's representative to the administration.

Other administrators have pointed out that the SAC is gradually being weakened by the changes in student interest.

As the students interest in services and extracurricular activities decrease they are becoming more interested in academic matters. It has been suggested that the activities of the SAC should be shifted in this direction.

OPPOSITION TO TEACHERS

In general, the same persons who oppose increased student influence also oppose more faculty powers.

Dr. Woodside is opposed to faculty representation on the board of governors because the members would have to be elected. This would mean that faculty members would become involved in political maneuvering to get certain persons on the board in order to support certain measures.

The faculty members should not be asked to involve themselves with matters the board and administration are concerned with. They should not have to be concerned with the problems connected with the day-to-day administrative operations of the university, he says.

Dr. Woodside says the U of T Act provides adequate safeguards for faculty members. For example, the board cannot fire faculty members; only the president can do this.

In addition, the Senate, although it is idle much of the time, acts in a "fire brigade" capacity and is invaluable in protecting faculty interests, Dr. Woodside says.

TEACHERS TO BLAME

But another senior member of the administration—who prefers to remain anonymous—claims the Senate does not function very well. He says this is the fault of the faculty members, who constantly demand too much of the academic body but do very little as Senate meetings.

He says there would be very little value in having academicians on the board of governors, because their point of view could be adequately expressed through the Senate.

This same administrator claims the teachers are indulging in a lot of unnecessary bickering through the faculty organization, the Association of the Teaching Staff.

"They could assume all the power they want if they were willing to organize on the same basis as the public and high school teachers," he said.

Because of the shortage of university teachers, any organized demands would have to be met. But the teachers want the powers while at the same time they have a fear of being organized on trade union lines, he said.

NOT LIKE TRADE UNIONS

Comparisons with trade unions is a sore point with the faculty association, and Professor Bora Laskin, AFS president, is quick to disclaim any similarity. He also claims that the faculty association cannot be considered a professional association, in the normal sense.

But above the tumult of student, faculty and administrative dissension can be heard one voice reason and understanding. In comparison to most of the persons involved in the issues, President Claude Bissell appears to be the only one who has a grasp of the total situation.

In a speech to honors students last March Dr. Bissell said: "We are not concerned with a conflict between mildewed authority and bright-eyed youth, but between two fully responsible points of view."

A REASONABLE MOVEMENT

He went on to express his belief that students were not partaking in a superficial or unreasoned movement, but were acting as citizens going into a world where they would be asked to share greater and greater responsibilities.

While Dr. Bissell recognizes the beginnings of a division within the university, he views the problem as one of applying political theory to the academic community.

The existing pressures should lead to a greater decentralization of administration and authority, Dr. Bissell maintains.

He says there is a need for acceptance of the idea that students and faculty members have a genuine concern for the university and that they have ideas that are well worth considering.

Dr. Bissell recognizes the increased interest of students in the welfare and future of the university, and points out that by 1970 more than 20 per cent of the students will be in graduate school, with most of these committed to an academic career.

PARTNERSHIP BASIS

The students, faculty and administration must operate on a partnership basis, while at the same time recognizing the subsidiary relationship of the students of the university as a whole, the president said.

Unless the university were to revert to the old idea of a community of equal scholars in mutual instruction, Dr. Bissell said he could not see any formal decision-making role for students.

However, he does believe that even now a legitimate role of the SAC would be one of providing ideas and criticism on academic matters.

Dr. Bissell does not feel that the administration-faculty situation is one of conflict; rather, it is a problem of effective administration. The question is one of whether administrators should be drawn from a broad spectrum, or whether they should be isolated to one group.

As the university develops, the three groups within it become more conscious of themselves, Dr. Bissell explained. Both the students and faculty have a growing consciousness that they have a particular role to play in the community, he continued.

But if there is too marked a consciousness, the community breaks down, the president said.

VIEW OF THE PRESIDENT

The best indication of Dr. Bissell's position is the way he is viewed by those students and faculty members who are in contact with him. Generally, he is considered to be a young man for his job, who has by-passed the established members of the university and failed to pick up any of their conservative attitudes.

Dr. Bissell does not view the tensions within the university as any great threat in themselves. Where the problem becomes important is in the university's relationship with government and society.

The president is well aware of the pressures government could exert on the university, but he realizes that these pressures could best be resisted by a cohesive university community.

It is in relation to this larger problem that the importance of the university's internal conflict lies.

New seven-team hockey setup appears successful at early stage

By GORD BELLMORE

When the old two-division Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League was reshaped into one seven-team unit this season, there was some fear there would be too great a range in the calibre of the teams.

In the first analysis, however, the new plan seems headed for a successful freshman year. With the exception of Waterloo, which is definitely out of its class, the rest of the teams have been closely matched.

Obviously, some teams are better than others, and this will show increasingly as the season progresses. But the supposed "weak sisters", Queen's and Montreal, have dispelled most misgivings about a poor league.

Montreal Carabins in particular have been a real surprise, winning both their games so far. And Queen's Golden Gaels, who have played only the two top-ranked teams, Toronto and McMaster, have not looked out of place, despite losing these matches.

On the average, the defensive play in the league has improved over the early games of last year, as scoring totals are down.

Better defensive play or not, Varsity Blues have been playing below their potential and against Laval Rouge et Or tonight in Quebec City they will have to be at their best. Rouge et Or are only a point behind Blues in the standings, and the results of tonight's tilt could eventually have an important bearing on the final standings.

Blues, Laval and McMaster are generally conceded to be the only serious challengers for the title, and games between them are particularly crucial.

Coach Joe Kane hopes certain key men in his lineup will pick this weekend's games against Laval and Montreal to break loose as he feels they really can. While the "Mop" line has been flying, its goal production is down from last year. Only Steve Monteith is scoring while linemates Sonny Osborne and Ward Passi are having scoring troubles.

Blues' second line of rookies Don Fuller and Hank Monteith and veteran George Olah showed definite signs of better things in last week's Queen's game. Kane believes this unit is one of the best in the league, and if it and the Moppers get on target, there will be trouble for opposition goals.

STRAY SHOTS: Laval have three shooters in the top eight in scoring, Yvon Paquet, Malcellin Tremblay, and Paul Doucet, while Blues have none in this group ....

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

PHE cagers tie Redmen by defeating Redmen

By AL SCHOENBORN
Interfac Editor

Physical and Health Education I moved into a tie for first place in Group I Interfaculty Basketball after a close 41-38 win over leading University College I.

The importance of the foul shot became evident in the second half as a Redmen comeback fell short because of an acute inability to sink the gift shots, PHE, meanwhile, led by Wayne Wessell, swished half its second-half points on free throws.

Wessell had 12 points for the winners, followed by Jim Holowachuck with 11. Peter Peskun paced the Redmen, scoring 11 points, while Alby Garbe and Andy Birrell sank nine apiece.

Meds A took over the lead in Group II with a close 39-33 comeback win over winless Law A. Meds B won in Group III, handing Vic I its first setback after three straight wins. Elsewhere, Pharmacy A took Trinity A, 35-26.

Basketball Bumlings: I Mechs 18, Pre-Meds II yr. 16; Vic II 39, Gull Surveyors 19; Vic Fat Men 51, UC Animals 30; UC Wallace 45, Vic Rackhams 31.

WATER POLO

Water polo types got into the swim of things this week with a full schedule of games.

In a repeat of last year's final, PHE outscored defending champion, Meds IV yr., 12-8. Larry Bell led PHE with four tallies, Harvey Armstrong scored three.

A pair of tallies each by Marv Mandelbaum and John Hastings paced Sr. PHE to a 5-3 win over Vic I. Bill Jackson was the pick of the losers with a pair of goals.

Meds I yr. trampled UC, 8-0, paced by the five-goal performance of John Maki. St. Mike's A drowned Meds II yr., 11-2, as Larry Dorf hit for half a dozen counters.

HOCKEY

In an exciting contest, which saw both teams spazz a host of opportunities, PHE I and UC I played to a 1-1 tie in Group I. Don Arthurs hit for PHE while Bob Wardell counted for Redmen.

The point from the tie moved UC into sole possession of first place ahead of Vic I. Phys. Ed gained its initial point in league play.

Pharmacy A closed the gap in Group III with a 2-0 win over UC II. All four teams in that group are now within two points of each other.

Intermediate Doings: Emmanuel C 3, Pharmacy C 3; Trin C 3, SPS IV 2; New 5, Music 0; Vic III 3 Meds B 1; SPS VII 4, SMC E 1.

'WARD TWINS' SAY NIX TO VARSITY-SAC TRICKS

Disaster struck Rick "Punch" Kollins' dauntless Varsity crew twice Thursday.

First, SAC president Doug Ward and SAC finance commissioner Larry Ward vetoed all practices for the upcoming Winter Carnival clash between The Varsity and SAC. Then, Kollins learned that the SAC Fluffies have signed a Junior "A" hockey star.

Toe Cunningham, coach and general manager of the Fluffies, had aroused the Varsity Inkmen by announcing that his team had arranged for a practice before the crucial game. Kollins then responded to pressure from his stars and arranged for the Inkmen to practice also.

The exact reason for the vetoing of the practices was not made clear but is expected that the Ward Twins felt if practices were allowed the Inkmen would rise to new heights of precision.

Kollins' inkmen have not yet decided what action to take against what Kollins termed "an underhanded fluffyminded conspiracy to undermine our (Inkmen's) chances."

The other part of a disastrous day was the announcement of the signing by the Fluffies of Don Arthurs, a former OHA junior "A" player and one of the best lacrosse players in Ontario.

In the Pennance Pit—Bob (Dictaphone) Rawlings, SAC administrator, suggested that The Varsity has been making a typographical error in referring to the SAC team as the Fluffies. Rawlings claims the real name is "Toughies."

Punch, a man with an ever-ready wit, shot back; "I guess the next thing you'll say is that the Inkmen are really the 'Stinkmen.'"

Contract negotiations between Kollins, "Shutout" Schoenborn and "Body-Basher" Barker continue to be acrimonious. After the latest negotiations Schoenborn commented: "Kollins will be the first man in history to get a penalty for holding with his stomach."

Apps surges into scoring lead

Rookie centre Bobby Apps of McMaster Marlins jumped into a three-point lead in the intercollegiate hockey scoring race when he fired three goals and added two assists in Mac's 6-4 win over Queen's last Saturday.

Apps, son of former Toronto Maple Leaf great Syl Apps, has scored five goals and picked up seven assists for 12 points in only four games.

Stan Sharman and Don Mervyn of Waterloo Warriors moved into a tie for second place as Warriors lost to Montreal Carabins, 8-5. Sharman scored four goals in the game and linemate Mervyn assisted on all five goals. The hot Waterloo pair has nine points each to tie with Marcellin Tremblay of Laval Rouge et Or.

Sharman and Tremblay also share the league lead in goals with Steve Monteith of Varsity Blues. Each has netted six goals.

Veteran Andre Boucher of Montreal made a big jump, picking up five assists against Waterloo. Boucher has seven points, all assists.

Varsity goaltenders Larry Soden and Gary Aitken share the league lead in their department. Each has allowed an average of two goals per game. Soden has counted the only shutout of the season.

Defenceman Ken Thompson of Waterloo is easily the most penalized player in the league. Thompson collected a minor, 10-minute misconduct and game misconduct against Montreal to bring his total minutes to 42 in four games.

Matmen take on Wayne

If you disregard the main gymnasium where Blues basketball team plays Windsor Lancers tonight, Hart House will be crawling with the Tartars of Wayne State University.

Not only will Tartars be swimming against Varsity but the Wayne State wrestling team is also here tonight for part of the Athletic Night triple-header.

Wayne State is one of better U.S. wrestling squads and is led by last year's highest point-getter and most valuable wrestler award winner, Charles Guthrie. Guthrie wrestles in the 123-pound class.

Waltz Lyszak, a 157-pounder, Don Urban, a 177-pounder, Dave Marten, at 191 pounds, and Paul Demarke, a heavy-weight, are in prime condition after completing a rugged season on the Tartars' gridiron.

Wayne State's coach Bob Hurley is a former University of Michigan fullback and in 1953 led the Big Ten in rushing with a 6.3-yard average carry.

Blues' lineup for tonight consists of Wayne Carney (123 lb.), Clive Good (150 lb.), Al McKenzie (137 lb.), John Holt (147 lb.), Larry Angus (157 lb.) and Don Merker (177 lb.). Blues still have not decided who to enter in the 167, 191 and heavyweight classes, where they lack talent. Varsity lost its heavyweight when Ray German broke an ankle this week.

Like their swimming brethren, the Tartar wrestling team travels to Western to take on Mustangs Saturday.

LANCERS VS. BLUES TONIGHT IN 'CRUCIAL' CAGE CLASH

By PAUL HENDERSON

Canada's best college basketball team of 1962-63 invades Hart House tonight to renew the Senior Intercollegiate League's most traditional rivalry.

Windsor University Lancers clash with Blues in the first important OQAA game of the season. These clashes have always been exciting, see-saw affairs.

Lancers are defending intercollegiate titlists and won the Canadian championship last year by defeating Acadia University in the initial all-nation competition.

Windsor is again considered the team to beat as their five starting players have returned from last year. All-star forward Joe Green and 6'4" Bernie Friesmuth lead the list of lettermen. Green stood seventh in league scoring last season with a 14.7 game average. Friesmuth was right behind with a 13.8 average.

This year, Friesmuth, hitting on 49.2 per cent of his attempts, has been scoring an average of 17 points per game. Green's average is identical to his final tabulation last season, but received a boost from a recent 34-point barrage against Lawrence Tech.

Guard Bob Horvath and 6'5" centre Tom Henderson are sporting 13.3 averages in nine games this year.

Windsor's average of 92.8 points per game attests to the strength of the team but their record in Hart House neutralizes the awesomeness of this power. Although Lancers edged Blues here, 78-74, in '62-63, it was only one of six victories wrestled from Varsity in 18 matches played at Hart House since 1945.

On the other side of the ledger, Blues have won only four times in 18 contests in the Border City. Obviously, neither team looks forward to the hospitality of its host.

Blues do not intend to depend on the record books to guarantee a win, but the advantage of having the home court would seem to establish them as favorites.

Varsity coach John McManus concedes that Windsor will be tough, but his charges have been showing their talents lately.

"If we play like we did against Florida Southern," said McManus, "we'll beat Windsor. But can we ever play like that again?"

The solution to this question will be evolved at 8:30 p.m. tonight.

Under the Basket: Varsity players Nolan Kane, Jim Sheldon and John O'Neill will not likely see action tonight because of injuries... Senior Skule meets St. Michael's A in an interfaculty match scheduled for 6:30 p.m. ...

★ ★ ★ Buffalo dumps Blues

Toronto Varsity cagers dropped a 82-52 decision to a strong University of Buffalo squad at Buffalo Wednesday.

Varsity coach John McManus regarded the game as a good preliminary workout for the Windsor game tonight at Hart House. Buffalo employed a press against Varsity and Blues will undoubtedly encounter this manoeuvre against Lancers.

Gary Hanley of U. of B. was top scorer with 28 points. Dave West, high Blue with 21 points, led a second-half drive that netted 39 points. Blues shot only 19 per cent in the first half and trailed 33-13 at the break.

Bill Woloshyn hooped 8 points and Ed Bordas managed only 7 under the check of Hanley, an experienced centre.

SWIMMERS SQUEAKED BY TARTARS LAST YEAR

We have more balance--Wayne coach

By SHEL KRAKOFKY

Varsity renews an old swimming rivalry when it hosts the team from Wayne State University tonight at Hart House. Toronto holds a 3-1 edge in the four meetings of the two squads since 1951.

Blues squeaked by the Tartars last year, winning their dual meet in the very last event. Tartars' head swimming coach, John Hussey, says this season's Wayne squad has no glaring standouts, but has better overall balance than last year's.

Wayne State, located in Detroit, swims in the President's Athletic Conference and has won the PAC championship for the last two years.

Last month, the Tartar tankers won the PAC relays in Cleveland and lost a dual meet to Albion. The top returning Tartar letterman is captain Dave Wendler, the PAC 200-yard medley and 200-yard butterfly champion.

Blues are looking for their first win against American competition, having lost to Colgate University last week. The Varsity team wants to win this meet in a convincing fashion and the swimmers have posted some excellent practice times this week. Two of the standouts of last week's meet Graeme Barber and Rob Campbell, have shown exceptionally well in practice.

Both Barber and Campbell are versatile swimmers, entering both relay and individual events.

BABY BUBBLES: Wayne State swims against Western Mustangs in London Saturday... McGill's Bill Peers, the 200-yard intercollegiate backstroke champion, is an added threat in the free-style this year. He was timed at 50.3 seconds in the 100-yard free-style in a meet last week, which is faster than any Varsity swimmer has gone that distance so far this year... Tonight's meet starts at eight bells, a half hour before the basketball game.

A COIN FLIP MAY BE THE ONLY RESORT

IF THE PIECES FALL into place as expected, this season's Senior Intercollegiate Basketball League race should be the closest in recent years. Windsor Lancers are given the favorites' role, mainly because of their undefeated championship season last year, but three other teams in the league, Varsity, Western and Waterloo could surprise Lancers and walk away with the whole kit-and-caboodle.

The factor that gives these four teams the inside track to the Wilson Cup is experience. It has been quite a while since so many of the league's teams have had so many veterans on their squads in one season.

Lancers now operate under the auspices of University of Windsor. But don't let that fool you. They're the same Lancers that carried the Assumption University colors to the league and national championships last season. Lancers didn't have an exceptional player in their lineup last year. The key to their success was a strong team effort and overall strength. Things haven't changed.

Joe Green, Bernie Friesmuth, Bill Brown and Tom Henderson give Lancers a solid forward brigade. Bill Hassett and Bob Horvath are the starting guards. None of these players finished among the top five league scorers last season but four did finish among the top 20. Green was selected to the first all-star team, Friesmuth and Horvath gained second-team recognition.

Western Mustangs' strength is centred around guard Tom Williamson, the king of all scorers in 1962-63, but Western's depth and experience goes farther than that. Forwards Wally Dick, Barry Mitchelson and Ken Barclay have college experience behind them and veteran Leo Innocente has returned to the hardwoods after a brief absence. Innocente used to combine with the amazing Gene Rizak at Assumption to give Lancers the best guard combo in all Canadian college basketball.

Waterloo is only playing its fourth season in the senior circuit but already has established a reputation as a top basketball school. Warriors have not yet come close to the championship but this could be their year. Sophomore Jerry Raphael was the all-star centre one season back and ran third in scoring to Williamson and Dave West of Varsity. Don Demko, Jim Hann and Bob Pando have been around for a while and Dick Aldridge, a product of Toronto's Runnymede Collegiate, is back with the team after a year ineligibility. Pando and Hann joined Raphael last season in the top 20 scorers with averages exceeding 10 points per outing.

THE DAYS OF HAMMERIN' HANK ARE GONE

VARSITY BLUES HAVE THE most experience of any team in the league if you consider their entire roster. Doug McKenzie, for example, is not listed in Blues' first string but has had three years' qualification. The starting five of Ed Bordas, Dave Ouchterlony, John O'Neill, Bill Woloshyn and West are long gone from their rookie days.

The overall experience in the intercollegiate league is shown by the fact that of the top 20 scorers of last season 15 are still playing. This can't help but improve the quality of basketball and both teams and spectators will profit.

In a short 12-game schedule, every contest is important for the contenders. And the so-called four-pointers between these top teams are that much more important. One win or loss can make a giant difference in the final standings.

Blues have only played one league game but already are faced with a "crucial" contest tonight at Hart House against Windsor Lancers. A Lancer victory will put the defending champs four points ahead of Varsity and put Blues behind the eight ball. A Varsity victory will keep Blues in the thick of the title race.

"Cactus Jack" McManus' Varsity crew has at least one thing going for it tonight—Lancers have only won 6 of 18 games at Hart House since 1945. In comparison, Lancers have taken 14 of 18 games in Windsor over the same period. When Lancers edged Blues, 78-74, here last year, it was their first win in "the black hole of Calcutta" since 1959.

The Varsity-Lancer games in Stevens' haven have traditionally been thrilling. Three of the last four games have been decided by less than five points. And fireworks were not uncommon when Hank Biasatti coached the Lancer squad. One year the fiery mentor had to be led off the Hart House floor by two St. Mike's priests after he exploded in opposition to an official's ruling. Biasatti's temperament is said to have been responsible for his release from Assumption and the subsequent replacement by present coach Bob Samaras.

With Samaras in control, some things have changed. But, then again, some things never change. You can bet your bottom dollar that they'll be hanging from the rafters again tonight to see the year's top basketball attraction. It will be hard to beat last week's classic between Varsity and Florida Southern, but if Blues come away with a win tonight the Florida Southern game will be ancient history.

Make vast CUS changes

By KEN DRUSHKA

Proposals for student participation in the new Department of University Affairs and a strengthened regional structure dominated the Canadian Union of Students Ontario regional conference at McMaster University over the weekend.

Following fast on the throne speech announcement Wednesday, which created the new government department, the 13 Ontario universities represented decided to involve student government in the area of university government.

Basically, the conference created a strong regional office with University of Toronto Students Administrative Council president, Doug Ward, elected as temporary president.

After unanimously passing a motion expressing optimism over the Ontario government's decision to create the new department, the conference passed a motion outlining four general areas of student action in relation to the government.

The conference expressed its hope that the government would recognize the necessity of providing within the new department for the full expression of Ontario student viewpoints.

The areas of chief concern defined by the congress (Continued on page 2)

Lancers puncture cage title hopes

—Vsp Czornecki

This was the story all night as Joe Green (top) and his Windsor Lancer teammates held Dave West (bottom) and Blues in check to win, 88-79.

By PAUL HENDERSON

Varsity Basketball Blues' aspirations for the Intercollegiate title were dealt what could prove to be a disastrous blow Friday night.

Blues succumbed to the power of the press, authored by University of Windsor Lancers, and dropped a 88-79 decision before an overflow crowd at Hart House.

The win, Lancers' third straight in the young intercollegiate season, was only their seventh wrested in Hart House over the last 19 seasons. And Lancers, had to erase a 42-40 half-time deficit to accomplish the feat this year.

The infrequent loss by Blues in their own quarters is not a good sign. They are now confronted with the unenviable task of defeating Windsor in the latter's own gym or counting on Western or Waterloo to perpetrate the unlikely upset. Another loss would almost eliminate Blues from contention.

Says west need not fear war from Russia

The West should have no fear of war from the Soviet Union, but the concept of "peaceful coexistence" can be a dangerously loaded one, delegates to the first annual Conference on Law and World Affairs were told this weekend.

The highly-successful conference managed to answer many questions about legal aspects of the Soviet-Western Detente, but posed many more in the process.

"A common language of law" enables the two blocs to communicate, the most optimistic legal expert of the Conference Harvard's Professor Harold Berman argued, despite a radical difference between the East and West ideological approaches to law.

Prof. Berman explained that while Western law is geared to provide society with a check on authority, the Soviets regard the legal system as a means by which the leadership directs and controls society. This difference is illustrated by the reluctance of the Russian bosses to recognize the principle of presumption of innocence, although in practice the burden of proof lies with the prosecution.

Berman described trends in Soviet law which are encouraging a "common language of law". The Soviets have purged their system of its most barbaric features, and about seven per cent of (Continued on page 2)

Adelman urges passive role for SAC

By CAROL BURNHAM and BOB AARON

Howard Adelman (SGS) began his brief to the SAC committee hearings on Friday with a bit of "conventional Canadian wisdom" — that the function of a university is to "provide an atmosphere to encourage study." His report proved to be anything but conventional.

If the function of the university is not merely the cultivation of the intellect but something broader, the student government must change, he said.

"The will must be educated as well as the mind, and in this sphere, the student government is inherent to the very process of education.

"The education of the will must be decision-making not just through practice, but a matter of education based on a practical doing, while considering things on a theoretical level."

To work towards this goal, the SAC should be organized primarily as an organ of communication, and as a control factor. Its role would then be passive.

If the SAC wants to be an active body, it must be reorganized to have a role in initiating policy. Its basic flaw now, he said, is that it gets opposite opinions on the executive, which react against each other.

To remedy this flaw, the president should have the right to choose his own executive, either from inside or outside the SAC.

Adelman believes in a decentralized system that makes for "a stronger central government with less to do and more important things to do, run by the students for the students."

On the financial level, the SAC should become involved with things that will make a profit in order to subsidize service organizations, Adelman suggested.

A psychiatric service could be started within the medical service, and a housing service set up to compete with such organizations as Co-op, which would welcome the competition, he said. A bank could be started within the university, and perhaps even a credit union which could yield assets of $48-000,000 in a few years.

Adelman also suggested that the SAC take the $47,000 it has tied up in government bonds, and get it working. "The last people that the government needs financial support from are the students," he said.

Such steps can be effective. In 1958 the Co-op had assets of $50,000 and today it has assets of $250,000 he said.

Mike Levine (II UC) and John Laskin (III UC) submitted a joint report advocating improvement in election procedures by the standardization of elections, and the removal of such trivialities as balloons and pretty girls.

The aim should be, they said, to concentrate on the issues and personalities, rather than on the gimmicks. Don Rogers, UC SAC rep, remarked: "The serious candidate who wants to make a real contribution must go through all the razzle dazzle and apathy to get the position," as procedures now stand.

They recommended that all elections for SAC reps be held on the same day throughout the university. The big problem is getting the colleges to agree. It is advantageous for them to combine elections. If the SAC undertook almost every phase of the election, the problem would be solved, said Levine.

Laskin and Levine regarded The Varsity as a far from ideal organ of communication. "The Varsity is the instrument of the SAC and isn't utilized to that extent," said Levine.

One of its main faults, they felt, is the inferior quality of writing that goes into the paper. They recommended that the SAC take a greater role in selecting the editor.

Levine remarked that it is often thought that The Varsity publishes the opinions of SAC, and many of its statements reflect badly on the council. To remedy this situation, The Varsity must be totally severed from SAC, or made more dependent on the council, he concluded.

Bruce Lewis (II UC) presented a brief which took the SAC Committee 1½ hours to wade through.

The brief outlined his ideas of the general purpose and functions of the student government, and the structure it should have to achieve these goals.

Concerning financial matters, Lewis said the present system of apportioning money to student organizations is hybrid. He advocated that students should pay a common fee to be distributed by SAC to all campus activities according to need.

were: Any act or regulation where authority is exercised by the province, a university or technical institute over a student government; financial aid to universities, particularly to specific faculties or for particular purposes; and the area of general academic programs.

The congress further declared that the student viewpoint within these areas should be permanently provided for within the provincial government.

"We have built a new structure whereby a representative student voice can be heard on the issues which are of greatest concern to the students of Ontario," Mary Pat McMahon, (III SM C), SAC vice-president said.

David Jenkins, CUS national president, speaking in Toronto last night, said that "up until now the university and technical students of Ontario have been most inadequate in their representation to their provincial government."

"This has been very surprising because of the most powerful student governments in Canada are located in Ontario," Jenkins said.

"It is my view that the new structure in Ontario will mean a sharp reversal of form, and that the needs of the students of this province will be more effectively put forward," he added.

Jenkins said he could see no area of conflict between the strengthened regional office and the national CUS office, because the Ontario office would be mainly concerned with education matters.

The Ontario region of the CUS had previously only had a vice-president, David Casey, of the University of Ottawa, and an administrative co-ordinator, Albert Alexanian, of McMaster University. These two persons will remain in their positions for another year.

It was decided that the position of regional president should be held by a non-student council member in Toronto. Doug Auld, now president of the University of Western Ontario Students' Administrative Council, was elected as the 1964-65 regional president. He plans to be at U of T next year.

The president's job will be one of representation to the Ontario Government and private bodies. He will be directly responsible for implementing actions outlined in the four areas of chief concern.

Law Conference (cont.)

its present criminal code approximate Western codes.

And the increase of discussion of law behind the Iron Curtain has stimulated reform in all fields of the system, argued Prof. Berman.

These trends were termed a "running down of the 1917 revolution" by another expert, Professor John Hazard of Columbia. And the partial success of attempts to revitalize the revolution - the Comrade Courts and the upped incidence of the death penalty - only point up the extent to which Soviet law has become stabilized, claimed Prof. Hazard.

Yet on the foreign front, Soviet aims become even less clear. Yale's Professor Leon Lipson warned delegates "peaceful coexistence" is only a legal device for promoting the spread of communism. Non-interference and emphasis on negotiation are useful for avoiding war, but as in the past, these concepts will be used a ploy to further Soviet ends, he argued.

Agreement the Soviet definition of "peaceful coexistence" is undesirable came from Prof. Hazard, but he cautioned that since the Afro-Asians use the term, albeit for another meaning, the West must take the lead to find a universally acceptable definition.

The optimist Prof. Berman pointed out Soviet use of international law as an instrument of foreign policy also puts a limit on Soviet policy, and urged the West respond to the debate on peaceful coexistence in positive terms.

Prof. Lipson's detailed paper on "peaceful coexistence" provided an accurate account of what Soviet Ambassador Ivan Shpedko did describe as peaceful coexist-cern.

The new structure will become formally effective in May, but until that time Ward will speak for Ontario students because of the immediate importance of representing students during the formative stages of the university affairs department.

The decision to set up a strong regional structure as a basis for student action followed the pattern set in the Canadian University Press. The Ontario CUP members established a regional office early this month, with Bruce Kidd of The Varsity as president.

In both cases it was felt that the national organizations were unable to provide the type of services desired by the Ontario members.

The two-day conference passed more than 30 resolutions. The main resolutions were submitted by the University of Ottawa, Queen's University, the University of Waterloo, and the U of T delegates.

Representing U of T were: Miss McMahon; Kevin Keough, III SMC, CUS chairman; John Lombard I WYC; Maria Greeney III SMC; Diane Callon II SMC; Dick Frost I Law; and Louise Dawe SGS, all CUS committee members.

ence in the conference finale at Hart House.

In courageous English, the ambassador listed the planks of the policy which Prof. Lipson had analysed Friday afternoon - non-intervention, competition without war, negotiation and mediation to settle disputes.

The conference opposed a debate resolution to support de Gaulle's efforts to emancipate Western Europe from American leadership 53-18 after a spirited and often satirical debate.

Speaking for the resolution, Vince Kelly argued that the general has consolidated a new French-German rapprochement, and has restored harmony with the Russians.

But, cautioned John Brewin, "de Gaulle is only interested in restoring France to the rank of a first-rank power, and is prepared to use any tactics to achieve his purpose."

differences in student interest without punishing those in-

Proffered in certain activities. There would be no reason under Lewis' system for SAC's refusing grants to the Psychology Club and Hart House Orchestra Associates, as it did recently.

SAC would set up machinery to apportion money and supervise the use of it. This would prevent misuse of funds and possible discrimination in subsidizing student activities. All student activities would be subsidized by and responsible to SAC.

Lewis advocates maintenance of adequate and responsible communication between students and the administration, and favors a student voice on the board of governors.

SAC should make representations when necessary to the Caput on anything including academic matters, but should not participate in individual student discipline. SAC should conduct inquiries and, from time to time, make representations to outside bodies such as the Ontario government.

To enable this, Lewis favors the introduction of rep by pop, and an increase in the size of SAC. The present structure, he maintains, is not fluid enough.

Lewis suggested each SAC rep have a constituency of 200 to 250. The constituency should be divorced from the college organization, and SAC should run the elections itself, if necessary. Clubs should have a non-voting seat on Council.

"An enlarged council will be better for justice, perspective and continuity," Lewis said. It should be as easy as possible for anyone to speak in Council.

These plans can only come about gradually. Increased supervision can begin as more clubs begin to apply for financial aid.

After SAC proves its ability in handling all campus clubs, it can look forward to taking over the financing of the athletic department.

Lewis sees parking as a special campus problem.

"There should be no parking on the front campus," he maintained. He recommended the construction of an underground parking garage on the west side of Spadina for both students and faculty.

The SAC hearings continue this week.

22 points. When Green was not setting up his teammates with accurate passes, he engaged in working himself free to receive them.

But it was Windsor's full-court press that devastated Blues. Green, Bill Brown (13 points), Bill Hassett (13), Bernie Friesmuth (12) and Bob Horvath (9) literally covered Varsity every time a Blue got the ball. Blues were forced into inaccurate shooting and passing and became frustrated at the close checking.

As a result, Blues incurred too many unnecessary, and occasionally questionable, fouls under the eye of referee Lorry Moffatt. Varsity centre Ed Bordas fouled out of the game at the seven-minute mark of the second half after a disappointing performance which netted him only five points all on free throws. However, Lancers did surge ahead without Bordas opposing them on defence.

Arvo Neidre also fouled out of the game, forcing John O'Neill into spot duty, but O'Neill's injured ankle prevented him from being very effective.

Dave West totalled four fouls in the first half but stayed free of fouls in the second to lead Blues with 18 points. Except for his efforts at the foul line, where he hit eight for eight, West's shooting was off. He was also hindered by having to play conservatively in the second half because of the fouls.

Dave Ouchterlony was one of few Blues who played well. He unveiled a good jump shot to net 17 points and picked off his share of rebounds. Guard Bill Woloshyn scored 16 points in a steady performance which is becoming customary for him.

The lead changed hands several times, with Windsor going ahead 28-21 at the end of the first quarter. Blues tied the score 33-33 with five minutes left before taking a 42-40 lead at the half.

Windsor started strongly in the third quarter and went ahead 50-49 in the fifth minute. After Bordas departed, Lancers increased their lead to 66-57 at the end of the third quarter. Blues' efforts to steal the ball and reduce the deficit during the last five minutes only gained them an increased number of fouls.

Varsity coach John McManus felt that his team didn't deserve to win. "They (Blues) got too many stupid fouls and Lancers were too good," said McManus. "And with O'Neill's bad ankle, we didn't have the depth."

Under the Basket — Windsor followed their victory over Blues with a 102-62 trouncing of McMaster University in Hamilton Saturday night... The complete inadequacy of Hart House for basketball was evident once again Friday. Several hundred precatators had to stand and many had difficulty seeing the play.

Windsor — Green (22), Brown (13), Hassett (13), Friesmuth (12), Horvath (9), Woloshyn (8), Mazuchin (3), Biliard (2), Henderson (2), MacMillan (2).
Toronto — West (18), Ouchterlony (17), Woloshyn (16), Neidre (8), Bordas (5), Kimel (4), McKenzie (4), Baranowicz, Sheldon.

Dalhousie reinstates editor

HALIFAX (Special) — The Dalhousie University student council, which earlier put the editor of its student newspaper on probation for "lack of critical editorials," has backed down, partly because of a critical editorial.

Two weeks ago, the council approved a motion putting Dalhousie Gazette Editor Jerry Levitz on three weeks probation because of lack of critical editorials in the paper.

The motion came after Le-vitz returned from the Canadian University Press annual competition in Vancouver. For the first time in four years the Gazette had failed to place.

Last Thursday the Gazette retaliated with a scorching editorial criticizing the student council for its action. This editorial, together with a threat of resignation by the entire editorial staff, led to the council to reverse its decision, said a member of the newspaper staff.

By CAROL THRELFALL

The Combined Engineering Recruiting Program started last week with representatives from 160-170 industries interviewing fourth-year students.

Not only Engineers but science students in the Faculty of Arts and Science are involved this year. Thursday, Friday and Saturday classes were cancelled for the occasion.

J. K. Bradford, head of the University Placement Service, is in charge of the program, which, he said, is running very successfully for the seventh year.

Interviews are being held anywhere a spare room can be found—mostly in the various engineering buildings, old and new.

The number of representatives from each company varies, some sending only one and some as many as five or six.

Most of the large oil companies, chemical companies, the National Research Council, and pulp and paper companies are among those represented.

One personnel man from the U.S. is recruiting for a branch of his company in Toronto.

From Jan. 2-10, the students were allowed to sign up for interviews with eight companies of their choice. Yesterday the lists were opened again so they could sign up for as many others as they wished.

Mr. Bradford reports that the students are usually able to speak to all the companies they are interested in if they signed up early enough.

Says spirit of sympathy must overcome stubbornness

Rev. Arthur Moore, president of Victoria University, sits on many committees within the United Church, and is chairman of the committee on church union. He has had many talks with Dr. Owen on the proposed Anglican-United Church merger. His interview with The Varsity indicates how anxious both sides are, but how much ground has yet to be covered when the two churches meet later this year.

After talking with Rev. Arthur Moore, president of Victoria University, one can see that unity of the conciliar United Church of Canada with the episcopal Anglican and papal Roman Catholic churches will be achieved only after a trilateral spirit of sympathy has overcome basic stubbornness.

But the United Church certainly must be recognized as a leader in the Christian unity movement.

Dr. Moore is chairman of the United Church's general council and a leader in union talks with the Anglican Church of Canada.

Dr. Moore believes that, while the churches were desirous of unity, their consultation teams had slowed down. "I felt we had reached a roadblock, but the problems are being attacked with new sympathy now."

The "problems" centered around deciding "just what constitutes the ordained ministry. Ours is a conciliar church, based on councils and courts. Order in the Anglican Church resides in the episcopacy. We feel the councils have an historical continuity, as the Anglicans feel the episcopacy has.

"The episcopacy and the conciliar are seen by each church as a guarantee of what a new church must preserve."

Just how united could this "new church" be? Dr. Moore agrees with other ecumenists that "any organic form of unity without uniformity is a long way away. But the type of church I foresee would be one by which, without attacking the sacramental administrations, parishes could become closer by such things as exchange of pulpits, united welfare programs and actual conversations — such as are going on now.

"Unity, to have any meaning, must at least include the impression that the churches belong to one family, have common aims, and speak in common terms — even if a monolithic ecclesiastical structure is not attainable.

Rev. A. B. B. Moore
"... any organic unity a long way away."

"So I still think one of the most useful merits of unity is the elimination of this competitiveness of churches, an attitude of pride between them that discredits them.

Dr. Moore sees encouraging signs from the Catholic side of the unity dialogue.

"There is no doubt that the approach of Popes John and Paul has given fresh impetus to union. . . . Roman Catholic use of the term "Christian brothers" rather than "separated brethren" or even the old "heretic" has warmed the hearts of others. . . . In Montreal, a United Church minister was invited to preach in a local (Catholic) parish church. And the priest returned the same.

Dr. Moore usually gets across Canada each year, and feels his ideas of people's attitudes towards unity arise from impressions he has received. "I would dare to say that, while there are no doubt some denominational loyalties that would tend to slow union, generally speaking the ordinary lay member of the United Church really doesn't see why there isn't union. Some are even impatient of our slow progress."

What are the forms of dialogue the United Church has undertaken? It is a member of the World Council of Churches holding the reformed (Protestant) faith, the World Council of Methodism, and the Internationalist Congregational Council.

But all of these groups are pointing toward unity of strong Protestant communions. Dr. Moore admits that the United Church does and will represent the historic Protestant position.

But, again, as Dr. Moore has said, a multi-denominational unity must be sought. "Following the instruction of the executive of the general synod this fall, we have agreed to meet with Anglican representatives to deliver an actual plan of union. Both sides have met, and we will try to have a joint meeting over several days, hoping to get down to cases. We feel the Anglicans are ready to meet us.

"What Anglicans and Roman Catholics consider essential cannot be accepted by others on the basis of tolerance alone. Tolerance (not a good word) will itself be a quality to be tolerated," Dr. Moore said.

Major Anglican interest is church union

Rev. Derwyn Owen, provost and vice-chancellor of Trinity College, took active part in and was host at sessions of last summer's Anglican Congress. He is often in contact with Father Baum, the Catholic spokesman for church unity.

"It may sound obvious, but the major aim of the Anglican Church today has to be reunion of the whole of Christendom." This is how defined the issue of church unity is in the view of Dr. D. R. G. Owen, provost and vice-chancellor of Trinity College.

Dialogue between several of the 18 Anglican independent national churches with other churches is a real concern at present. "Many of these national churches, that run on their own steam, are in concrete negotiations with Protestant communions like the Methodists Presbyterians and Congregationalists. A few are approaching the Baptists.

"On the more catholic side, the Archbishop of Canterbury is in close contact with the Orthodox denominations." Dr. Owen himself has had many contacts with the noted Roman Catholic ecumenical spokesman, Rev. Gregory Baum of St. Michael's College.

Dr. Owen sees Anglicanism's informal and independent structure as an aid rather than barrier to unity. "Omission of concrete standards is a source of strength." The only ultimate earmarks the Anglican Church will always posit are the Bible, creeds and historic ministry."

Dr. Owen can assert, therefore, that the current "very serious negotiations" with the United Church of Canada will produce a union only if both sides accept these bases as essential.

"We're not narrow-minded in this stress of essentials, but they present the only possible way to reunion."

The three essentials are also defended to allow dialogue with the Roman and Orthodox churches. "Stressing these basic allegiances is a good example of my opening statement, full unity as our ultimate aim. We have our eye on ultimate reunion with Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches.

"It is very important that a reunited Christendom retain all the aspects of the church, because they have retained their worth over the centuries.

"No one wants a monolithic, forced religion that forces an either-or alternative on the individual." On the other hand, Dr. Owen is quick to note that "freedom can only be exercised within limits. Otherwise, freedom becomes licence and liberalism becomes anarchy."

Dr. Owen recalled a succinct quotation, "the rules of authority provide the conditions of freedom rather than the destruction of freedom." This view allows Dr. Owen's evaluation of an historical Christianity become separated.

Dr. Owen has debated with Father Baum on television, and maintains what he knows the Anglican position on the Papacy will always be.

"We do object to Papal infallibility, because it represents the authoritarian. Father Baum feels that without some final authority, a church just wouldn't 'look like a church'."

However, Dr. Owen looks approvingly on current Roman Catholic reform. "The role of the Papacy is being modified from within, by the acceptance of the collegiality of bishops. We have always believed in what we call the Bench or House of bishops, with a bishop in each diocese.

"Most Anglicans would be perfectly happy to accept the Bishop of Rome on historic grounds as primus inter pares, the position of the Archbishop of Canterbury."

Papal infallibility was defined as dogma by the Roman Catholic Church at Vatican I in 1870.

Rev. D. R. G. Owen
"... stress of essentials presents only possible way to reunion."

Asked if tolerance would be a good enough momentary answer to ecumenism, Dr. Owen agreed that "mutual forbearance" had already taken place between churches often mutually smug through history.

"We don't feel we're sparring anymore. There was a time when persons didn't recognize others as even Christian if they did not belong to their "own" denomination.

Remarking on the most promising effect of last summer's Anglican Congress (which Dr. Owen hosted in part at Trinity), he felt that openness, sense of unity and feeling of mutual responsibility between members of member churches were most obvious.

"We are open intellectually, ready to entertain even radical interpretations, in an effort to communicate with the world. (The Congress' theme was The Church's Mission to the World.) We don't want to be over-burdened by the established forms of the past.

"I think John Robinson's Honest to God debate helped this attitude. We take it for granted he's a Christian, trying to find a way to talk to the world.

"We have to be responsible to our poorer members. . . . And we have to get the gospel free of its present theological accretions. People have to understand as well as accept. Even intelligent laymen can be bewildered by terms like the doctrine of atonement."

Parts of the Mass have been ruled optional.
An end of the Roman collar has been suggested.

About such fast progress in the reform movement, father Baum has a solid answer. "There is an unde-niable danger in the modern movement, just as there is in the gospel itself. The good news of Jesus is constantly threatened by an egotism and stubbornness. The greatest reform by the church could never protect the vulnerability of the gospel."

What has Pope John and Pope Paul's Vatican II done, and what remains to be accomplished in the next — and proba-

"The council passed a document on the liturgy, which gives a deeper understanding that the liturgy of the church is the place where God acts upon His people, through scripture, preaching and sacraments. Hence the liturgy must be made more understandable by (a) more vernacular and (b) simplified rites that make the liturgy a community celebration.

This fall, father Baum foresees a "definite formulation of what is already begun, a church and ecclesiastical movement.

"And I am hoping for a reform of the seminaries, so they can be places where boys become men, in fact apostolic men.
Too many seminarians remain boys. One bishop has said that the trouble with seminaries is that they produce seminarians."

Free style relay prominent once again

By SHEL KRAKOWSKY

What a difference a year makes.

Last year, Varsity Blues swimming team just managed to defeat Wayne State University in a dual meet by winning the very last event, the 400-yard free style relay.

Friday night at Hart House, Varsity lost the 400-yard free style relay but soundly defeated Wayne State Tartars, 67-27. In fact the only event that Varsity lost was the 400-yard free style relay. They defeated Tartars in 10 of the 11 events and swam their second team in the final event to give Wayne a chance for at least one victory in the lopsided meet.

Blues' regular 400-yard free style relay team of Tom Verth, Graeme Barber, Pete Richardson and Rob Campbell will attempt to break the existing Canadian record for that distance this weekend at Hart House pool.

Pete Richardson was the only swimmer in the meet to win more than one event, taking both the 50 and 100-yard free styles.

Varsity diver Bob Smagala came up with one of the best performances of his career Friday night, amassing 174 points en route to victory.

Wayne State's top performer, Dave Wendler, finished second in the 200-yard individual medley and butterfly events. He is the President's Athletic Conference champion in both these events.

400 yard medley relay—1, Toronto; 2, Wayne. Time 4:03.4.

200 yard free style—1, Verth, T.; 2, Cunningham, W.; 3, Porter, T. Time 1:55.5.

30 yard free style—1, Richardson, T.; 2, Ashenurst, T.; 3, Pottle, W. Time 24.1.

200 yard individual medley—1, Barber, T.; 2, Wendler, W.; 3, Chapelle, T. Time 2:17.2.

100 yard butterfly—1, Campbell, T.; 2, Wendler, W.; 3, Boyce, W. Time 2:30.0.

100 yard free style—1, Richardson, T.; 2, Barber, T.; 3, Gardiner, W. Time 52.6.

Tom Cushing's rink loses in quarter-final of 'spiel

Tom Cushing's University of Toronto rink discovered Saturday that all good things must come to an end. After advancing to the quarter-finals of the 59th annual Canada Life bonspiel, Cushing was eliminated by Ken Warner's St. George's Curling Club rink, 8-4.
